Nor is this all. Suppose Great Britain and the United States each demands of France that she pay or fund her debt to the United States, then there immediately arises the question of preference. What proportion of what France can afford to pay will be paid to Great Britain and what proportion to the United States and in what order? It is evident that both Great Britain and the United States must have a common agreement with France to prevent improper preference, and that each may secure only its just rights. This would have to be considered as well as the matter of maturity of France's obligations. This would demand the concurrent action of the three nations; but France can not make these arrangements until she knows how she can arrange her matters with Italy, so Italy must be brought into the conference.

Mr. President, if we pass the compensation bill now, we must provide by law for the payment of the sums necessary to meet it. Simply declaring that it shall be paid out of funds derived from our foreign debts means nothing. It does not collect the debts. It does not enact the legislation necessary for a settlement of these debts.

It seems to me that under the present situation, so far as the soldiers' compensation bill is concerned, we are driven to one of two courses. The first and to my mind the most proper course is to enact immediately the law necessary for the settlement of these foreign loans, that we may use the interest accruing therefrom to meet the obligations incurred by the enactment into law of the soldiers' compensation bill. If that is done, and done quickly, I do not think it will be necessary to provide any additional means of taxation whatever to meet its requirements. If that is not done, the second and only course left is to provide for additional taxes at the time we enact the law. So we may be driven to a small sales tax, either a manufacturers' tax or a general turnover tax, to meet the added obligations; and if the first proposition is not put through speedily I am earnestly in favor of the second. In other words, we must make good to the soldiers, and that will be done.

As I stated when the soldiers' compensation bill was referred back to the committee, it meant delay, but it did not mean defeat of the measure. We shall enact it into law, and, in my opinion, in sufficiently early time that no change will have to be made as to the date when its benefits shall become effective.

In the meantime, I simply plead with the American Senate to act unitedly and fairly, agreeing, if they can, as Senators of the American Commonwealth in a great duty which we owe to the soldiers of that Commonwealth.

I shall not discuss for a moment the merits of the soldiers' compensation bill. I discussed that fully and at length some time ago, but I confess it sickens me to listen to speeches which seek to cry out against one political party or another political party. I know that on the Committee on Finance we had earnest Senators of the Democratic Party who were in favor of the compensation bill. We had equally earnest Senators belonging to the Republican Party who were in favor of it. We did not look at it as a partisan measure. We might differ upon excess-profits taxes or upon the higher brackets of some other tax, but we did not differ upon the great principle of the soldiers' compensation bill. Let us cast aside those things upon which we differ and not attempt to tie this proper legislation to those things, but let us get behind some proposition which will independently take care of the soldiers' compensation bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, particularly in view of the fact that he and I labored most earnestly together to frame the bill which has been known as the adjusted compensation bill. I became convinced then that the Senator from North Dakota was a firm believer in the principles of that bill. I know he labored earnestly and industriously in its preparation, and no man ever advocated a measure in this body with greater earnestness than did he in relation to that bill.

The bill passed the House, it came over to the Senate, its provisions were discussed in the Senate, and was taken up for consideration by the Senate with only four votes in opposition. When that bill was reported the Senator from North Dakota, in one of the strongest and most effective addresses to which I have listened in this body, urged the passage of the measure. He called particular attention to certain changes which had been made by the Finance Committee in the bill as it came from the House. The bill as it passed the House made no provision for it to become effective until January 1, 1923. The Senator from North Dakota laid much emphasis on that, and with all of his well-known vigor and earnestness pleaded that in that respect important changes should be made.

That adjusted compensation bill as it came from the House contained five optional plans. It was not thought that the most important provision was that for the payment of the cash adjusted compensation, but the other provisions were pointed to as the most important. I remember well how the Senator from North Dakota minimized the importance of the cash-payment plan provided in that measure. He referred to the certificate plan as something which should go into operation, provide security for the family in case of death, and an ultimate endowment at the end of 20 years—in 1943.

But he urged as the reasons for its immediate passage certain other provisions of the bill. He called our attention to the fact that there was a provision whereby, if the ex-service man wanted to acquire a home or wanted to acquire a farm, the Government would assist him in such acquisition; and the Senator thought that those provisions were so important that, in the bill as it was reported to the Senate, the Finance Committee, under his direction and under his leadership upon that measure, changed the date when it should become effective from January, 1923, to January, 1922.

The Senator argued, with all the force that he could command, that if it was the intention of the Government to provide such aid and assistance to ex-service men, it should not delay; that now was the time, the accepted time, the day of the greatest necessity.

He called attention to another provision of the bill, which provided for vocational education. He called attention to the significant fact that in the year 1922 the average age of the veterans would be 28, and I remember yet how his voice rang in the Chamber, calling attention to the necessity of providing such vocational educational aid beginning on the 1st of January, 1922, if the Government were going to extend such aid at all.

I heartily concurred in every suggestion made by him at that time, and the other Senators who discussed the subject gave to those thoughts their most earnest support. We all realized the reason, the justice, the soundness of the argument advanced by the Senator from North Dakota. So the bill was before the Senate. There is not the slightest doubt but what that bill would have passed this body by an overwhelming majority had it not been for the tragedy enacted here on the 12th of last July by the President of the United States.

On the 15th of July, when the question came before the Senate as to whether or not the bill should be recommitted, and after the vote had been carried to recommit it, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota rose in this Chamber and undertook to give some courage and some hope to the ex-service men of this country.

I shall not attempt to quote his words, but I remember very well how he held out the hope that this was only a temporary suspension of the provisions of the bill. He distinctly stated that the bill was to be referred back to the Finance Committee; that he was a member of that committee; and that he would see to it that earnest and prompt consideration should be given to the presentation of that bill at some other time, but in the near future. He held out that hope to every ex-service man in this country, and even to-night we listened to his words of hope, and he undoubtedly intends that the ex-service man shall retain that hope. When he presents his argument, when he undertakes to specify how he expects that to be done, I submit that the ray of hope is slight indeed, and that it is vanishing in the dimness of the unknown future.

Others in this Chamber have likewise undertaken to give hope. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in his address the other day opposing the sales tax proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], used very significant language. It is so significant that I believe I would be justified in a consideration and analysis of it at the present time.

The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin made one of the most logical, one of the most convincing, addresses in opposition to the sales-tax provision offered by the Senator from Utah that I have listened to in this Chamber. He analyzed the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah; he showed precisely where the burden would rest; he showed the injustice and the inequity of such a measure. He demonstrated—if logic can demonstrate any proposition in economics—that the proposal of the Senator from Utah would be the most vicious manner of imposing a debt of the Federal Government upon the people of this country. He pictured it in language portraying all the horrors which one could conceive applied to a tax measure. But even he, after denouncing it and demonstrating, I believe, that such a measure would be justified only in the most extreme circumstances, intimated that there would be an occasion in which even he would accept the sales-tax proposition; and in that connection he undertook to give out this ray of hope to the ex-service men of the country. I think I am justified in reading what the distinguished Senator said upon that occasion:

I am not one who will take the position of being opposed to a sales tax under all circumstances. In my judgment, a sales tax is justified only when we have reasonably exhausted all other sources of ability to pay, and until such sources are exhausted, a sales tax, whether it be a manufacturers' tax or a turnover tax, can not be justified, because it violates the principle of taxation according to ability to pay.

The time may come, Mr. President, when, having reasonably exhausted these other sources, and additional revenue is needed, a sales tax will be justified. I am not ready to say, for instance, that if in this bill we impose all taxes upon wealth which equitably ought to be imposed, and impose all taxes upon corporations which equitably ought to be imposed, and impose all taxes upon special privileges which equitably ought to be imposed, and then we need more revenue, I should be inclined to favor a sales tax, and I think we are very likely to face that condition in the very near future.

Before this bill shall go from the Senate, we are given to understand that a proposition will be made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to attach an amendment to this bill providing for the soldiers' bonus, and a method of paying for it by a continuation of the excess-profits tax. I shall not impute any political motives to the Senator from Missouri, but I venture to say to those upon the other side of the aisle that while they may think they are securing a political advantage because of the fact that the soldiers' bonus will not be incorporated in this bill—and it will not be—their joy over that fact will not be very long lived, because the soldiers' bonus bill will pass the Senate, the soldiers' bonus bill will pass the next Congress, and the soldiers will have lost nothing by the delay, because under the provisions of the bill which is now sleeping in the committee, not one dollar of payment would be made to any soldier before the 1st day of next July, and while I am not a prophet, and I know only how I myself shall vote, I venture to say that before the 1st day of July comes around, the soldiers' bonus bill will have been passed by an overwhelming majority of both Houses of Congress, and it will be time enough then for those upon the other side to charge the Republican Party with ingratitude to the soldier, but not until then will they have any foundation for doing so.

At that point I asked the Senator from Wisconsin a question, as follows:

Mr. President, will the Senator then kindly inform us what advantage has accrued to the country from the recommitment of the bonus bill, which was before the Senate for consideration at the time the President came and asked that it be recommitted?

To which the Senator from Wisconsin replied:

I can not, Mr. President; and I will say further that there is no disadvantage to the soldier in its recommitment, provided it is passed before the time that he would secure benefits under it.

I brought that matter up to state that if in this bill, when it is finally enacted, we have reasonably exhausted other sources of taxation, then I shall be willing to vote for some kind of a sales tax to raise the revenue necessary to pay that bonus.

Mr. REED. From whom is the Senator quoting?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am quoting from the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], delivered on November 3, in opposition to the sales-tax amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Now, Mr. President, that statement of the Senator from Wisconsin involves two propositions, both of which ought to receive very serious and earnest consideration, because they must be significant. The Senator from Wisconsin, to whom I have referred, is one of the most able and influential Senators in the Congress, especially at this particular juncture. He undoubtedly wields great influence here, and I am sure that the statements made by him were not made until after much reflection and mature consideration. Moreover, what he anticipates, what he prophesies, is supported by the remarks of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, Mr. FORDNEY, whose interview appeared in the Washington papers a day or two ago. He, too, said that there would be a sales tax, that there would be a bonus bill, that they would be coupled together and thus make provision for the ex-service men in the near future. So, taking his statement and the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin together, it seems to me that the Senate and the country may accept those statements as the plan which is now proposed by the majority of the two Houses of Congress.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to-night has proposed something else. He has proposed that we utilize in some form the indebtedness of our allies and other foreign countries to the United States. That is a beautiful thought if it were made standing alone, but the distinguished Senator proceeded to discuss the matter somewhat at length, and as he proceeded with his argument the feeling of hope which had arisen in my breast that the majority party were intending to do something for the ex-service men began to lower and weaken and to disappear.

We listened to the Senator for several minutes discussing the woeful situation which exists in Europe to-day. He told us how the economic conditions of all those countries were interwoven. He pictured the distressful condition in which England finds herself. He pictured the woeful condition in which France finds herself and in which Italy finds herself. He said that England could not be expected to pay until France should pay, that France could not pay until her debtors paid, likewise with Italy, all of which undoubtedly meant that finally nothing would be paid until Germany could be made to pay.

With the German mark getting lower and lower in value, gradually declining, sometimes precipitously declining, until to-day that mark, which was worth 24 cents in American gold in ordinary times, that mark on which Germany is dependent for the existence and support of her Government, is worth less than one-half of 1 cent. I ask the ex-service men of the country if they gain any hope when they are asked to rely upon the payment of those debts by Germany, by Austria, by Hungary, and the other Central Powers who have gone bankrupt and whose currency has been diminishing in value until it has almost reached the vanishing point?

That is the hope which the Senator from North Dakota holds out. Are the ex-service men of the country satisfied with that hope? Do they wish to wait until Germany and Austria and Hungary have paid the expenses of keeping our soldiers on the Rhine, have paid the expenses of keeping the soldiers of Great Britain and France on the Rhine, have paid the necessary amounts which the treaty of Versailles requires that they shall pay under the control and dictation of the Reparation Commission? How long under those circumstances must they expect to wait before this bonus shall come? Take that contingency, that hope, and apply it to the provisions of the pending soldiers' bonus bill, and I then wish to inquire when in the sweet by and by they may expect any benefit from such a bill? I ask these young men, who in 1922 will average 28 years of age, how long before they will receive their vocational education, how long will it be before they get a start in life, how long will it be until they go to school and learn a vocation? Just wait until some time in the sweet by and by when the German mark may rise in its value, when some time Germany may pay her debts to France and Italy and England, and then the United States may get something to pay the soldiers a bonus.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there can be no one who wants to adjust this compensation, who wants to do justice to the ex-service men, who believes that they need vocational aid, who believes that they need assistance in acquiring a home or a farm, who will place any reliance in this provision built upon this foundation of sand pictured to us by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

The other hope, then, is that which comes from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. He tells us that a sales tax is the most vicious form in which public revenues may be collected from the people of this country; he tells us that he would not advocate such a system until all the other reasonable sources for obtaining revenue should have been exhausted; that only in the last extremity would he levy a sales tax. It is obnoxious to him; it clashes with every fiber of his being; it attacks his conscience. He pictured to us the great burden that it would place upon the backs of the common people of this country; he pictured how such a tax would levy tribute upon the bread and the meat and the clothes of the indigent people of this country; he pointed out to us the dire results in the most vivid and lurid language; and he tells us that only in the last extremity, after all other resources have been exhausted, only then would he levy a sales tax. If we are to accept his premise, then we are to consider whether or not we have exhausted all of the resources of this country which may reasonably be touched in order to obtain the revenue from those who are better able to pay.

Now, let us consider that. The present revenue law provides several different methods for obtaining revenue. There is what is called a flat tax, which is levied upon corporations, amounting to 10 per cent of their net income; there is what is called a normal tax, which is levied upon the net incomes of individuals and of individuals doing business as partners; and upon the income of individuals and partners there are levied additional taxes, surtaxes, increasing as the amount of the income increases, until finally we reach the point where those surtaxes under the provisions of this bill, as it has been amended since it came into the Senate, amount to 50 per cent, and together with the normal tax amount to 58 per cent.

It is recognized that that kind of a tax is justified. There is yet no one in this Chamber who has not conceded that the man with an income of $50,000 a year should not pay at a higher rate than the man with only $5,000 a year; that a man whose net income is $100,000 a year ought not to pay at a higher rate upon that higher income than the man with a lesser income. That principle has already been established by the Senate. It was sanctioned by this body with a very few votes against it, and the only votes which were cast against it were so cast because some thought that the surtax ought not to exceed 32 per cent; but there was not a single vote here and not a voice from any quarter of this Chamber against the principle that those who are best able to pay should pay; that that ability should be measured by the amount of the income; and, therefore, that those having the higher incomes should pay the higher rates. It is a principle accepted by every citizen in the land; and every nation on earth, so far as I know, which levies an income tax has embodied the same principle in its legislation. So we accept the principle that as the incomes grow larger and larger the rate of taxation should become higher and higher. That is the way we treat the individuals and partnerships in this country.

However, there is another class doing business. We have in this country over 300,000 corporations, over 200,000 of which have net incomes subject to taxation under the revenue laws of our country. The incomes of those corporations vary from less than 5 per cent upon their invested capital up to enormous percentages. There are thousands of them which are earning to-day less than 5 per cent upon their invested capital, while we find other thousands earning only from 5 to 10 per cent. As we reach the higher percentages the number diminishes. We still have other thousands, though not so many, earning percentages reaching as high as 1,000 per cent; many of them earning more than 100 per cent, and a still greater number earning more than 75 per cent.

What does this Congress propose to do? Are we going to apply to corporate incomes the same principle which we apply to individual incomes? Not at all. It is now proposed by the Finance Committee to levy a flat tax rate of 15 per cent upon the net income of every corporation. Whether it is earning 2 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, 75 per cent, or 200 per cent, it is proposed to levy this tax on all alike, utterly ignoring what I believe to be one of the most just laws of finance which has ever been announced; that is, that the burden shall be placed upon those who are best able to pay, and that all those who are enjoying the same degree of prosperity should bear the burden equally. We are ignoring that fundamental and righteous principle of Federal and governmental economics.

Why? That interrogatory has been troubling many of us ever since this question arose. I have not any doubt but upon the street corners, in the lanes, in the crossroads of the country, as people travel alone they ponder upon this. Why? Persons who meet together for the purpose of discussing governmental affairs at this time all over the land are to-day asking—why?

Under the present law there is a flat tax of only 10 per cent. There is another provision that corporations earning more than 8 per cent upon their invested capital and not more than 20 per cent upon such capital shall pay an additional tax upon the amount between 8 per cent and 20 of 20 per cent of that amount, and of the amount of the net income which exceeds 20 per cent of the invested capital that there shall be levied upon that income 40 per cent; that is the existing law. It clearly recognizes the fundamental principle of having those pay who are best able to pay. That is the law now; but when we repeal the so-called excess-profits tax and place an equal tax, an equal rate, upon the incomes of all corporations, be they ever so humble or ever so mighty, as is proposed to do here, the question arises—why? No explanation has been made which furnishes a reason for violating the law or principle to which I have referred. No one has risen here but has apologized for the change in the existing law. It has been pointed out that those corporations, more than 100,000 of them, which are owned by hundreds of thousands of stockholders throughout the country and are earning 8 per cent or less upon their invested capital will have their taxes increased by 50 per cent, while all other corporations earning over 8 per cent will have their taxes reduced. I wonder how long the American people are going to stand for that outrage, not only for this subversion of that great principle of economics but actually taking the burden from the shoulders of those concerns best able to pay and deliberately placing it upon those less able to pay; but that is what is proposed to be done.

Now let us apply to this situation the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. He says that this sales tax is so infamous that he will not consent to its levy until all the other resources are exhausted. I ask you, my fellow citizens, does this bill exhaust the other resources? I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin; I agree that a sales tax should not be levied until the other sources are exhausted; but have we exhausted those resources? What about these excess profits, these profits of corporations which are in excess of a reasonable amount of earnings upon their invested capital? If those profits are taxed for the next year in accordance with the brackets placed upon them by the present law, they will bring in a revenue of $450,000,000. As I have said heretofore, the excess-profits tax has its disadvantages. Under the existing law there are a great many provisions which do not make for exact equality; but if the Senate of the United States would devote some of its efforts to rectifying that law, to smoothing out its various inequities, to making it more just as between the various classes of business, the revenue could be raised without doing injustice to a single corporation in the land. We must have this revenue. Let us raise it from that source where the taxpayer can bear it more easily than his unfortunate neighbor.

Why should not that be done? Here is this source of revenue. Let us not turn away from it until it is made to produce what it reasonably should produce. These times are extreme. It is true business is not prosperous at the present time; but remember that that tax touches only those corporations that are enjoying prosperity even in this time. It touches only income. It touches only net income—net income estimated after having provided for all costs and expenses of the business, for depletion, for obsolescence, for amortization, and all of the expenses permitted to be set off as provided in the existing law.

After all that has been done, then it says to the corporation: "You may retain 8 per cent upon your invested capital untouched by this law. Only as to the excess will we call upon you to pay something for the support of your country."

Mr. President, we are evidently faced with this alternative: Shall we abandon the excess-profits tax at this time without putting some other provision in its place? This flat tax of 15 per cent will not raise much more than one-half what the excess-profits tax raises under existing law. The flat tax is levied unequally. The other tax touches only profits and in a progressive way. Shall we abandon that when we need the revenue to pay the ex-service men compensation?

I shall not at this late hour picture to you the service which the veterans rendered to the country in the time of the late war. I leave that for the consideration of every citizen of this country. I discussed that subject on two former occasions, and I do not care at this hour to dwell upon it, because I know that the people of this country realize that there is a debt due to these ex-service men which should be adjusted at least to some extent, even a recognition of gratitude, of a debt that we all say should be paid. The hope held out by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] will not satisfy; the hope held out by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] will not satisfy, for two reasons:

First, the delay; second, the mere promise for the future; and when it is proposed to attach this meritorious measure of adjusted compensation to another piece of legislation which is deemed by the people of this country to be infamous in its effects, when it is undertaken to have an entering wedge, an entering measure which shall place a burden upon the necessities of life, you propose to put that through because you say it is necessary in order to pay the adjusted compensation. Will the people of this country be deceived by such promises as these?

Mr. President, I believe that the Senators understand this situation. If you are going to have this adjusted service compensation become effective at the time that it will be of advantage and of relief to these men, now is the time. The Senator from North Dakota told us that the present revenue bill simply provided for the actual bottom necessities of the Government for the fiscal year ending on the 1st of July, 1923. Under every system of legislation of this sort you must provide the revenue, and when may you expect it? This measure, as stated by the acting chairman of the committee, provides only for the bare necessities of the Government until July 1, 1923. How long, may I ask, do they want the ex-service men of this country to wait? The only other hope is that held out by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and Mr. FORDNEY, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that they intend to couple this adjusted service compensation bill onto that sales tax bill, which is admittedly the most vicious and infamous form of taxation which can be conceived, and which should be resorted to only after the exhaustion of all other resources. Do the ex-service men of this country want to be coupled with such an infamy as that?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HEFLIN. Is it not unfair and unjust to the ex-service men, after mistreating them so long, to use them for such a purpose as imposing upon the American people a sales tax?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I submit that question to the ex-service men of the country, and undoubtedly the answer will be heard.

Mr. President, there are many other things which I should like to discuss. The hour is growing late, however, and undoubtedly others will discuss this subject. I shall conclude now, with the hope that justice may be done these ex-service men and in the earnest belief that the only way in which we may hope to have it done is through the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have taken but 10 minutes of time in the whole discussion of this tax bill, and I want to take merely 10 minutes longer. I am growing to be something of an advocate of the proposition of taxing speeches of over an hour in length in the Senate. I think we might raise enough to pay the adjusted compensation in that way.

Mr. President, what I have to say is in no sense political. I do not believe that the Republican Party or the Democratic Party has any monopoly upon patriotism, nor do I believe that there is a single Senator in this body who is more friendly to the cause of the soldier than any other Senator; and the record of the Republican Party is sufficient evidence that it cares for the soldier.

Mr. President, I realize that one is termed a demagogue in this body upon very slight provocation. Those who are now advocating this bonus amendment on this bill have been called demagogues. I have discovered in this body that if anyone tries to do anything for agriculture in this country he immediately becomes a demagogue. If he tries to do anything for labor he is called a demagogue. Now, we add to this that if he tries to do anything for the soldiers he joins the class of demagogues. The way not to be a demagogue but to be a great statesman is to vote to take the tax off of golf balls and golf sticks and furs and excess profits. Then you immediately become a great statesman.

Last July this question was before us. The President came here. He made a powerful plea to the Senate. I had been in favor of an adjusted compensation act. I always have been. I was moved by the President's plea. I did not want to be in the position of doing anything to obstruct or make difficult the pathway of the President. I think he has been carrying and is carrying greater burdens, probably, than any man in the presidential chair since the days of Abraham Lincoln, and is carrying them well, with a steady head and hand and purpose. The bill went back. I tried at that time to secure instructions that the bill should be reported to the Senate by January of the coming year. We received only seven votes upon that proposition. Now it is presented to us again, and the issue must be met.

Mr. President, I wish I could picture two things that have occurred in the last 10 days that have settled my mind on this bonus proposition. I wish I had the descriptive power of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I can only relate these incidents in my humble way, because I am no orator.

Before our committee investigating the West Virginia situation a few days ago we had a great coal operator, a fine-appearing gentleman—and he was a fine gentleman—and he told us about their coal company. We delved into the profits, and the profits were enormous.

His company last year paid an excess-profits tax of $1,000,000. I asked him if that had injured his company, and he said no. Outside of paying that excess-profits tax of $1,000,000 they had paid large dividends. The prices of coal had not been increased to the American people on account of that. It simply meant that if that excess profit of $1,000,000 was not collected by the Government it would have gone in dividends. That is one picture which stood out in my mind.

On the Monday following that the other picture came before me. I was called to the anteroom of the Senate by a card. There was a man who said he had been a soldier from my State. He was a veteran of the Rainbow Division, that wonderful division which was a rainbow of hope to the people of distracted Europe. He had gone overseas. He was sitting out in this anteroom with 35 cents in his pocket. He was an Iowa boy. He had a sick wife and baby whom he had brought from New York. He had not a cent on earth outside of this 35 cents, and he was hungry.

My office went to work on the case. He had had 17 shrapnel wounds upon his body; was recovered, however, from them. We got no help from the American Legion, because they had so many cases that they could not handle his, and in desperation we turned to the Salvation Army, and those good people took that wife, that poor emaciated, hungry little woman, and that baby, took them to the hotel and fed them, and raised the money to send them out to Iowa. We helped with the man. I will not go into those personal matters, but, in any event, he is making his way out toward Iowa.

That was a picture I can not get out of my mind. The Salvation Army—God bless the Salvation Army—if there is an institution on the face of this earth that follows the teachings of the Nazarene, and which practices the teachings of the Nazarene, it is the Salvation Army, and that came home to me in this case above anything else I have ever seen of the great work of the Salvation Army, not only at the front in time of war, but at the front in time of peace; and if the members of the Salvation Army have ever done any wrongs in their lives the recording angel recording in the Great Book the wonderful deed of theirs would blot those wrongs out with his tears.

There are the pictures, the man with a million dollars of excess profits, well fed, everything on earth that anyone could want; and the soldier, who had suffered from wounds upon his body, hungry and discouraged, who had been out on the forefront of five or six of the greatest battles of the war and had helped to save the property of the company which had paid the million dollars excess-profits tax.

Mr. President, the bonus is coming; there is no question about it. I believe the Republican Party, if it is to be a party measure, will adopt the bonus in time. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in the House has told us that we are to have a sales tax with the bonus. I do not want to have the Congress face that proposition. If we put the bonus on this bill, it may be met by the excess-profits taxes. Maybe in time this country will come to a sales tax. I admire the persistence and the skill with which the Senator from Utah has managed that proposition; but I do not want the bonus to be dependent upon the sales tax, for I do not think the American people at this time are in favor of the sales tax.

Can we not afford it? Is the condition of our country such that we can not afford it? Half of the cigar bill of the United States and the chewing-gum bill would come very near paying this bonus. Are we not willing to make some sacrifices?

I stood at the Willard Hotel one night, seeing great numbers of finely dressed men and women, wearing diamonds and silks and satins, going in to a banquet. I saw two soldiers standing close to where the automobiles come up, and I walked over to them and asked them what they thought of all that scene. They told me that they had been overseas. I said, "How does this appeal to you?" One of them said, "If this is the civilization we tried to save, we wasted our energy."

We can raise this money. We could raise $540,000,000 of excess-profits taxes. Why not use it?

We had a proposition to raise the inheritance taxes. There were only 28 votes to increase the inheritance taxes in this country and divorce the great fortunes, which are handed down generally, from the spendthrifts who get them through inheritance. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri, providing that only the excess over 20 per cent should pay an excess-profits tax, was voted down and voted against by men who call themselves progressives.

I may be wrong about it all; I do not want to criticise anybody. Everybody is entitled to his own opinion, to his own method of voting. I have no criticism to make of any man. I believe this thing will come, but as for me, while I voted before to send it back to the committee, believing it would come out, whenever this question of bonus comes along in any fair way, the proposition to give adjusted compensation to the American soldier, I am going to vote for it, whether it is a Democratic proposition or a Republican proposition; and I will not be voting for it for votes. I do not care anything about votes. I am not doing it for votes, but I can not get out of my mind, and I never will, those two pictures—the man with his millions and the boy with his hunger and distress. He may not secure immediate relief from this bill but it will be an encouragement to the boys who fought when fighting was necessary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on last evening, when we had a colloquy on the floor in regard to agreeing to a limitation of debate, the suggestion came from the other side of the Chamber that too much of the time might be used by one side, and on that occasion I said, in substance and effect, assuming to speak for this side, which I probably had no right to do, that we on this side would see to it that those who are opposed to our position would be given a fair division of time. As the hour of 10 is now approaching, I suggest that, while there are a number of Senators on this side who desire to speak, if Senators on the other side desire to speak on this amendment, we now give them the opportunity—that is, we do not want to crowd in ahead of them. Therefore, Mr. President, I have risen to make that suggestion.

Mr. CURTIS. We are ready to vote.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there are some Senators on this side who are ready to speak. If Senators on the other side are ready to vote, I yield the floor to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, while not of the political party of the Senator from Iowa, I have followed his course and admired his courage for many long years. I do not recall that I have ever agreed with him before about anything; but seldom in my life, anywhere, at any time, have I ever had a simple recitation of the truth that touched me more deeply. If the Senator from Iowa dreams that he is not an orator, he is mistaken. There is no eloquence more telling than the unaffected, unadorned utterance of a great truth, coming spontaneously, like a fountain, from a warm and an honest heart. I shall carry with me the two pictures so graphically portrayed.

Yet that recitation, Mr. President, must bring to the cheek of every proud American a sense of shame. Oh, the pity of it. "'Tis true 'tis pity; and pity 'tis 'tis true" that the richest nation in all the world, for the mastery of mammon, has left Lombard Street for New York, and we are to-day admittedly the richest of all nations and the most puissant. Yet with our great exchanges, with our unlimited credit, with billions loaned to foreign powers, you have heard a Senator stand here in this place and tell of a hero whose body was torn and rent by shrapnel, almost a mendicant and dependent upon the goodness of the noblest army now enrolled in all the world, God bless it, the Salvation Army. I concur again with the Senator from Iowa.

Making no pretense to saintliness or piety, to me in all of truth and in all of fiction no artist has ever dreamed, no poet has ever sung, no sculptor has ever carved, it has never entered into the mind or the heart of genius to conceive anything so beautiful as the character of the Nazarene, and, like the Nazarene, they carry the gospel to the highway and the byway. They have no cushioned pews reserved for profiteers and no cold corners for hungry sinners, and that is the secret of the fact that in war and in peace the Salvation Army is touching the heart of the world.

We are told that our boys, wounded, needy, in pain, and in sickness are dependent upon the Salvation Army. Tell me you can not raise that money? If the party in power, if the President of the United States, instead of listening to the false, pitiless, insidious sophistry of high finance, as cold as a steel chisel, as heartless as a dollar, instead of making fine-spun excuses to this Chamber would advertise the fact that the Treasury would receive voluntary subscriptions, would pass the hat up and down the street or let the Salvation Army do it, we can raise $100,000,000 a year by voluntary subscription.

Tell me you can not raise this money? I agree with the Senator from Iowa. This is not and should not be a political question.

As governor of a great State, I saw these boys go out to do and die. I never named an exemption board that was not equally divided between Democrats and Republicans. I do not believe there is any inherent difference in courage or devotion to the flag on account of differences on the tariff or any other fiscal issue. When this question was raised in the House of Representatives the votes against the soldiers' bonus were almost equally divided between Democrats and Republicans. I do not impeach, I do not condemn, the other side of the Chamber on account of its Republicanism. I condemn it, and I here and now declare that it is entitled to the scorn, I will not say contempt, of patriotic men for its subservience. It is not for the political opinions in your heads, it is for the ring you have allowed high finance to put in your noses that I condemn you.

Not a political question, said the Senator from Iowa. Not a political question, said the Senator from North Dakota. Oh, you can not escape it. It is political now. You have made it political, not by what you did, but by what you feared; not by your speeches, but by your silence; not by your convictions, but by your inexcusable and abominable cowardice.

You were ready and willing to do this thing. The splendid and courageous sentiments that pulsate in the brave and tender heart of the Senator from Iowa found harmonic chords in yours. But when the word came, when high finance said to Mellon and Mellon said to the President and the President said to you that you should be guilty of this monstrous act of perfidy and ingratitude, you cowered under that lash and you proved subservient to that command.

If in the Sermon on the Mount an additional blessing had been promised the obedient, the superserviceable, every member of you to-day would have wings, you would be beatific spirits. You are the most obedient body to high command that ever belonged to a boss. And worst of it all you are not obeying the President.

Mr. President, I sat in this body for about a year before I opened my mouth. Some of you think I had better keep my peace now.

Mr. CURTIS. That is right.

Mr. STANLEY. My genial friend from Kansas says that is right. He believes it to-night if he ever did in his life.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator is not hurting anyone.

Mr. STANLEY. "Methinks the lady doth protest too much." However, be that as it may, I heard you, my fellow Senators, condemn a former President of the United States for daring to dictate to this great and deliberative body. You talk of Wilson's unholy ambition. If Wilson sought to dominate the Senate, if Cæsar were ambitious—

> If it were so, it was a grievous fault
> And grievously hath Cæsar answered it.

But Cæsar was not the first to wield the big stick. I say that whether it be Theodore Roosevelt or Woodrow Wilson or Warren G. Harding or any other man, alive or dead, who attempts to move any Member of this body by any other means than a cold, disinterested appeal to that man's patriotism and his reason, that President has been guilty of a grievous fault, almost a crime against the dignity of the Senate and the liberties of his country.

Why, we sent these boys, 2,000,000 of them, to the blood-stained fields of Flanders and of France to fight for what? Democracy. For freedom? For independence? For local self-government? Do you know that there was not a crowned head in all Europe, there was not before the war a kaiser or a king who would have dared to risk his scepter and his crown to do the thing that the President of the United States did here but a few short weeks ago. He has made the sins of Wilson, if sins they were, as white as snow. He has made Roosevelt, with his big stick, look as modest as a cooing dove. By his brutal order to you to reconsider, to recant, to repudiate this just obligation to the bravest men who ever deserved it in all the tide of time, his act will grow blacker and fouler with the receding years, and future historians will record it with a blush if they have shame, with tears if they have pity, with contempt and scorn if they have patriotism.

Let us see whether it is a crime or not. One hundred and fifty years ago we went to war with George III. He was a typical tyrant. Let me give you a little instance of his interfering with parliamentary bodies.

Said Mr. Pierce in his work on Federal Usurpation—

> when Fox brought in his famous bill for organizing the government of India, a great outcry against the bill arose. It was alleged that the object of the bill was the centralization of the immense patronage of India in the hands of a few old Whig families. George III, seeing the people aroused against the ministry, asked Lord Temple to let the members of the House of Lords know that any peer who should vote in favor of the bill would be regarded as an enemy of the King. Four days later the House of Commons by a vote of 153 to 80 resolved that: "To report any opinion, or pretended opinion, of His Majesty upon any bill or other proceeding pending in either House of Parliament, with a view to influencing the votes of the members, is a high crime and misdemeanor, derogatory to the honor of the Crown, a breach of the fundamental principles of Parliament, and subversive to the constitution of this country." Now, observe that this represented the spirit of English liberty 124 years ago under George III, whose tyranny was the bugaboo of the makers of the Constitution, the most powerful King in England during the eighteenth century, and perhaps it would not be an exaggeration to say the most powerful King of England for the last 200 years; yet George III, in all his power, was thus reprimanded.

A century and more ago it was a high crime and misdemeanor to merely report that the King would regard it as a hostile act; that it would affect patronage and chances for preferment! Yet the President of the United States comes here, under the Constitution, not to advise and to confer and to recommend, but like a schoolmaster, like a boss, to order you to do, not that which you thought was right, but that which he considered politically expedient. There is no excuse for it.

The Democrats care nothing about making politics out of the bill. We seek to help the soldiers. We are willing to cooperate with you. We are willing that you should have the glory. Yet with wounded heroes mendicants in the streets, with the pitiful appeal of the Senator from Iowa still fresh in your memories, with men stripped to the waist and sold as slaves on the Boston Common, with the wounded, the maimed, bleeding, hungry, houseless, out of employment, out of bread, out of hope—yea, with the suicide's revolver ringing in your ears; we are burying dead soldiers who have killed themselves, who found your heartlessness worse than the poison gas and the deadly arms of the Prussians—deaf and blind to it all you still stubbornly refuse to give them the crumbs that fall from the profiteer's luxurious table because the President said nay.

Now, observe that this represented the spirit of English liberty 138 years ago under George III, whose tyranny was the bugaboo of our Revolutionary fathers, the most powerful King in England during the eighteenth century, and perhaps it would not be an exaggeration to say the most powerful King in England for the last 200 years. Yet George III in all his power was thus reprimanded.

I continue reading:

To-day usurpation has become so common upon the part of the President that we think little of it, yet an interference by the Kaiser with the action of the Reichstag, even when it is done indirectly, creates widespread indignation. Before the opening of the sittings of the Reichstag the court chaplain preaches a sermon in the chapel of the imperial palace before the members of the Reichstag and the German Emperor.

Dr. Faber, who now occupies that position, in preaching the usual sermon before the recent opening of the chamber, said: "The Reichstag ought to consist entirely of loyal deputies who are looking to and following the Kaiser with perfect faith, casting aside all doubt and all questionings. If we had such a Reichstag we could safely leave the control of our destinies to God and the Emperor." These words are said to have created almost a revolution in Berlin. The members of the Reichstag indignantly resented such teachings. But while Congress is in session our newspapers each day give much space to describing how the President is guiding the Senate, championing the rights of the people, how the Senate is defiant, how the President insists upon the recognition of the people's rights; and the play goes on and the American people seem oblivious to the portentous meaning of such usurpations of power.

O Mr. President, you did not obey the President of the United States. This was not the order of the President of the United States; this was not the purpose of the President of the United States. Tell me that for one long year a wise politician such as he is would without a murmur of dissent have seen this thing incubating, would have seen it passed by an overwhelming majority in the other House, would have seen it reported unanimously by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Those who know him better than do I, who understand his love of approval—I will not say of applause—who understand that as well as being a wise man he is somewhat of a practical politician, know the agony it must have cost him to have turned his back upon 4,000,000 deserving men. There was but one power on earth that could do it—the silent and insidious and pitiless power of mammon that knew what it could do, that understood its authority—I will not say the obligation which somebody, some organization, was under. It was the ring of the dollar that you obeyed; it was the command of high finance; and he was the mere medium. "The voice was the voice of Jacob, but the hand was the hand of Esau."

You will be called upon to answer to an intelligent and incorruptible electorate whether when the supreme hour came you listened to the rumblings of Wall Street or the agonizing cry of four millions of brave, deserving, and necessitous men.

Oh, you can not put a tax upon a profiteer. Mr. President, there was a time when profiteering was in a way inevitable. Prices went up, and the honest and the dishonest, the straight and the crooked all made money. Any business that was well conducted was immensely profitable; agricultural, mechanical, industrial, commercial, it mattered not. This is shown by the returns from excess-profits taxes in 1918, $2,505,565,939; the returns for 1917 were $1,638,000,000; making a total of over $4,000,000,000 in two years. That tax suggests the enormous profit which has been made; at least $10,000,000,000 of profits, perhaps, have gone into the pockets of the profiteers; profits made while the soldier was working for a dollar a day. It is not proposed on this side to go back and take anything which the profiteer made; it is simply proposed to ask the man who is still profiteering to divide with the needy soldier. The man who is still profiteering deserves a tax.

I see to-day, for instance, a statement in the Washington Herald of Saturday which is headed:

Six United States Senators and Judge Smyth start rent probe.

Then it goes on to say that Senator A. A. JONES of New Mexico now is paying $200 a month for his apartment and he balks at $340; that Senator JOHN B. KENDRICK of Wyoming is paying $207.50 and balks at $335; that Senator WALSH of Montana is paying $195 and balks at $287.50.

What does that mean? That means that in spite of the falling wages paid to carpenters and other mechanics, in spite of falling prices of building material, in spite of falling prices of labor generally, in spite of the fact that one can build cheaper than he could two years ago, the profiteer, with a strangle hold upon the buildings in which we live, is adding 60 or 80 and in some cases here in the city 100 per cent to the very roof over our heads. That means combination, as is admitted by the laws which are enacted to regulate it.

To-day labor is more poorly rewarded than ever before. The $2.50 that is paid to the laborer to-day will not buy him as much as $1 would have bought him before the war. There never was a time when the reward for a day's labor would purchase as little of the day's necessities; there never was a time when energetic and capable men had as little to eat and as little to wear and as little to hope for as now. Any man who is earning enormous profits now in the face of these conditions is earning them not on account of the skill in the conduct of his business but on account of the cunning with which that business is combined with some other business for the purpose of plunder; yet the dominant party refuses to take this money from the plunderer and to give it to the soldier.

Oh, but they say we shall have a sales tax; we will tack the compensation bill onto the sales tax, and then the soldier shall have his compensation. Why, that would not be giving the soldier an adjusted compensation; that would be lending it to him.

If the majority Senators enact a sales tax of 2 per cent, collect $500,000,000, and then give one-fifth of it to the soldiers—for it will take, according to the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] only about $100,000,000 a year—as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has shown, the soldier will pay one-fifth of the total amount raised. So you give it to him with one hand and take it back with the other. Is not that characteristic of high finance? If we must legislate for the benefit of the needy, then, as a matter of common justice, we ought to take the money away from the poor. The idea of making a rich man pay to feed a ragged mendicant with wounds on his body and a croix de guerre upon his breast—what a crime that is! The idea of asking the few dear profiteers that are left, who have done so little for their country and so much for the Republican Party, to stand such outrageous treatment as this! "Good God," said the woodcock, and away he flew. [Laughter.] You now are making your bed; lie in it.

The Senator from Missouri has given you a nut to crack; he has given you the opportunity to say whether you have hearts or whether the things that pulsate within your carcasses are purely automatic and entirely without feeling of any kind except fear. He has given you an opportunity to show whether you represent your constituencies or whether you represent Wall Street by the proxy of Mellon and the President. He has given you an opportunity to say whether you live up to the proud traditions of the Republican Party, hitherto the friend of the soldier, or whether you carry out the plans of the present organization, the most superserviceable slave mammon ever had since Moses broke up that frolic of the children of Israel around the golden calf in the neighborhood of Sinai. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED. I beg the pardon of the Chair; but I was going to ask the Vice President for a construction of the unanimous-consent agreement, as to whether we must vote upon these amendments before 12 o'clock or whether we should simply take a recess at 12 o'clock.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield for that purpose, if I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order to vote on the amendments at any time.

Mr. REED. Either before 12 o'clock or after?

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is sure that it is in order to vote on them before 12 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Unquestionably, but I call the Vice President's attention to the language:

That on the calendar day of Saturday, November 5, aforesaid, the Senate will remain in session until not later than 12 o'clock midnight; that at 10 o'clock a. m. on said day the Senate will proceed at once to the consideration of amendments that may be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and will continue such consideration until the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. unless the amendments are sooner disposed of; and that as soon as such amendments are disposed of, and not later than 3 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of what are known as the "Soldiers' adjusted compensation" amendments and will continue such consideration until the hour of 12 o'clock midnight, unless such amendments are sooner disposed of.

That far the language seems pretty plain. The doubt is created in my mind by the succeeding sentence:

It is further agreed that when such amendments are disposed of and that at not later than 12 o'clock midnight the Senate will take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m., on the calendar day of Monday, November 7—

And so forth.

My own judgment as to what the intent of the Senate was is that unlimited debate would end at 12 o'clock to-night; that we would take a recess at that hour; and that on Monday and thereafter all questions should be debated but for 10 minutes. I did not think that a vote was necessary to-night on these amendments; but I am frank to admit that the language is susceptible of two constructions, and I ask for a construction by the Vice President, because there is another amendment, perhaps two amendments, to be offered relating to this same subject matter, and I do not want those amendments to be deprived of an opportunity of presentation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, of course, if we continue to discuss this amendment until 12 o'clock the other amendments relating to the same subject will have to be considered under the 10-minute rule on Monday. I hope we may have a vote upon this amendment pretty soon, so that we may begin the discussion of the other two amendments and may have some time in which to present them.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the first part of the second paragraph of the unanimous-consent agreement which, I think, settles this question:

> It is further agreed that when such amendments are disposed of and that at not later than 12 o'clock midnight the Senate will take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m., on the calendar day of Monday, November 7, 1921.

That clearly means that the amendments on this question shall be disposed of before 12 o'clock to-night.

Mr. SMOOT. That was the understanding.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; that was the understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the understanding the Chair has of the agreement.

Mr. REED. Then I have only this to say, that, in all courtesy, we ought to conduct our business from now on so that when the pending amendment is voted upon, if it is defeated, there will be opportunity left to present the other amendments.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not expect to occupy to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. REED. Of course, I am not addressing that remark to the Senator from Wisconsin, for he is always very modest in the time he takes.

Mr. SMOOT. The unanimous-consent agreement provides for a vote on the "amendments" on the bonus question, not merely on "the amendment."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not want to be understood now as ruling that other amendments in regard to this subject may not be presented at a later time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I did not intend to participate in this debate at all, but some things have been said that lead me to make one or two observations, and they shall be very brief.

I am sure that every Senator was touched by the picture of the disabled soldier with 14 shrapnel wounds; and any Senator who had not read this amendment, who was not familiar with its terms, would naturally conclude that if this amendment were adopted and became a law, that poor soldier would secure relief through the coming winter. But, Mr. President, I want to read from the amendment that is pending just when that disabled soldier could receive a cash payment under the terms of the amendment that is now proposed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ought to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I discovered that in the copy given to the printer the date had been fixed six months off, I think it is, in each of these cases, and that the text of the amendment now pending before the Senate provides for the inauguration of this system immediately after the first of the year. In other words, it follows exactly the text and the original intention of the bill proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. I say that so that the Senator will understand the situation.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator states that, I again state that while the payments would not be postponed quite as long as provided in the text of the amendment before the Senate, nevertheless I still insist, if I understand the amendment—and the chairman of the committee having it in charge will correct me if I am wrong—no soldier, under the amendment as the Senator from Missouri now states he has it, could receive a dollar of cash payment before the 1st day of next July under the cash-option plan. I will ask the Senator from North Dakota whether I am not correct in that construction?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is my remembrance of the way the bill was drawn.

Mr. REED. May I ask the Senator from North Dakota if that was not the very provision of the bill which he proposed?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so. I have not examined it.

Mr. LENROOT. That does not affect the situation, Mr. President. I am speaking now of this picture of the disabled soldier who was to get immediate relief under this bonus amendment, when now it is admitted by the author of the amendment that not one penny could he receive before the 1st day of next July or, under the text as it is before the Senate, he could not receive a penny of relief before the 1st day of January, 1923, nearly 14 months away.

Mr. President, that being true, I want to repeat what I said the other day, that notwithstanding what these Senators say across the aisle, a bonus bill will be passed, and passed long before the 1st day of next July, and the soldier will receive every dollar that he would receive under the pending amendment under the pledges that have been made by the Republican Party.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. What is the source of revenue from which you propose to pay these bonuses under the bill which you propose to pass before next July?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the source of revenue will be discussed and disposed of when that matter comes up. I am discussing now the benefits to the soldier. The Senator from Missouri proposes to seek and secure the revenue through the retention of the excess-profits tax. That matter has already been decided by the Senate.

It has been decided for its repeal; and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] occupied most of his time in pillorying the Republican Party for, as he said, being the "tool of the profiteers" in repealing the excess-profits tax. I want to remind him, however, that when he was pillorying the Republican Party for being the "tool of the profiteers" because of its repeal of the excess-profits tax he was at the same time pillorying his candidate for President in the last compaign, Mr. Cox, because he, too, stood for its repeal. He was at the same time pillorying the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, who urged the repeal of the excess-profits tax. He was at the same time pillorying another ex-Secretary of the Treasury, now an honored Member of this body on the other side of the aisle, Mr. GLASS, who also recommended the repeal of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. Christ had one bad Apostle. The trouble is your whole church is wrong.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky wishes it to stand that the Democratic candidate for President in the last campaign was a tool of profiteers, I am willing to let the record rest right there.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I was wondering what became of all the $587,000,000 a year that Congress has appropriated to take care of these wounded soldiers.

Mr. LENROOT. I am going to come to that in just a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will permit me, I make that inquiry because I want to know whether there are wounded soldiers traveling from one end of this country to the other in a condition of utter helplessness, and whether the money that we have appropriated to take care of them is being withheld from them. If that is so, I should like to know why it is.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from Utah, in case a soldier has been in the hospital and comes out and has no permanent injury, if he receives any further compensation?

Mr. SMOOT. It all depends on whether at the investigation it is found that he has disability over and above 10 per cent. If he has, he does; and in the case recited by the Senator I can not help but believe that that man was disabled.

Mr. KENYON. No, Mr. President; he had been in the hospital, had come out of the hospital, was weak, but did not have a disability that would entitle him to compensation, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think he was in the hospital and had never drawn compensation?

Mr. KENYON. No; he must have drawn compensation while he was in the hospital, but I ask this question of the Senator: A man is in the hospital. He is wounded, but he is cured. He comes out of the hospital. Does he receive any further compensation unless he has a disability of 10 per cent?

Mr. REED. Undoubtedly not.

Mr. SMOOT. No; if he has not a disability of 10 per cent, he does not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. After 14 shrapnel wounds, no disability?

Mr. KENYON. He might have not a particle of disability.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator that I know boys in the District of Columbia from my own State who are drawing $157.50 a month, and one of them came to me the other day and wanted that increased. I said, "Why?" He said, "I can not live on it," and therefore he wanted it increased. Now, after Congress has appropriated $587,000,000 a year to take care of these disabled soldiers, if cases like this are reported to the Senate there ought to be an investigation made, and somebody ought to be held responsible for the condition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I do not wish to occupy more than a few minutes. The time is running on, and I said I would occupy only a very brief time, and I wish to carry out that promise.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. I must say, however, that I think when the soldier was described with 14 shrapnel wounds there was formed in the mind of every Senator a picture, of course, of a disabled soldier who was not receiving compensation from the Government. If that was so, Mr. President, whose fault was it? Who has had the administration of the disability compensation law up to the 4th day of last March? When you criticize Republicans on this side of the Chamber for their treatment of the disabled soldier I want to remind you that you had the administration of that law until a few months ago, and that you administered it so horribly that it became necessary when the Republicans came into power to reorganize the bureau entirely, and it is now for the first time being conducted in an efficient way in the interest of the disabled soldier.

Further, I want to remind Senators on the other side of the aisle, you passed the first disability compensaion law for the soldier. Who increased it? Was it the Democratic Party or was it the Republican Party that did so? I believe that it is still too small, especially for total disability, and it will be the Republican Congress that will further increase it before very long.

Mr. President, I do not like to think that there is politics in this matter, and yet I wonder if everybody on the other side of the aisle will rejoice or be disappointed when the Republican side does pass the bonus bill. I wonder if the Democratic side would rather have that as an issue to secure the votes of the soldiers or whether they would rather have the bonus bill passed. But whatever their views may be upon that point, I wish to repeat and it is only my judgment, but I believe that judgment well founded, that while you may for a month or two make the soldier believe that you are the only friends of the soldier, it will be only for a month or two, because the Republican Party, which has always fulfilled all its obligations to all our soldiers in all our wars—which can not be said of your party—will fulfill its obligation to the letter, and every dollar that a soldier would receive under the amendment now pending will be received by him exactly as soon as if this amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator asked me a question, and I am glad to answer it. We will not be glad; we will not be disappointed; we will be just dumbfounded if you do it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rules require that the occupants of the galleries shall remain silent.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand that if the pending amendment is defeated, the other amendment is to be offered; and there ought to be a reasonable amount of time left for its discussion. The amendment which is now pending was offered by me, and therefore I think I am entitled to a moment in which to draw the threads of this discussion together.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this juncture?

Mr. REED. When I get to a stopping place, I will yield very gladly to my friend from Arizona.

Mr. President, there is nothing quite so amusing in the world as to hear a man deliver an address denouncing the introduction of politics into a discussion, and then wind up by a boastful statement of what his party is going to do and a denunciation of the other party.

I wonder if gentlemen who make that sort of an appeal think the ordinary audience, even the audience in the galleries, who come here to be amused—I will not say instructed—are all intellectually as shortsighted as he is himself when he stands on this floor and denounces everybody on the other side of the aisle who has been trying to do something for the soldier as a demagogue and as playing politics, and then immediately declares that his party is the only party that ever did anything for the soldier. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not want the Senate to believe that I am attempting to play the rôle of censor. I am not an ex-soldier; I have not that honor; but if I were an ex-soldier I think I would resent some of the debate which has taken place.

I am not able to speak for other States, but the Democratic Party and the Republican Party in Arizona, both and each, are trying to solve this question without regard to politics.

I have here a telegram from the governor of Arizona, a Republican, which is as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., October 17, 1921.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Director Forbes of Veterans' Bureau has submitted report to President strongly urging immediate action to meet present emergency arising from needs of hundreds of disabled former service men who, with approach of winter, are pouring into Arizona, where facilities for their care are very inadequate. He recommends immediate completion of Whipple building program through letting of contracts, it being obvious that under system now in effect winter will be well over before any of the buildings now under construction will be ready for occupancy. Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager Veterans' Bureau, twelfth district, is now in Washington, and I therefore urge that Arizona congressional delegation take prompt action, conferring with Maj. Grant and Director Forbes and calling on the President, bringing strongly to his attention the desperate situation in which these men find themselves and pointing out necessity for immediate action along following lines: Speeding up of construction program at Whipple, establishment of vocational-training center at Prescott, acquirement of additional hospital facilities at Phoenix, and construction of cottages at Tucson to accommodate approximately 300 more patients. The need is very real, and I urgently bespeak your hearty cooperation.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL,
Governor.

Mr. President, I have information from the governor of Arizona, from the public press of my State, from the chambers of commerce of Prescott, Tucson, and Phoenix, and through numerous letters, that ex-service men, by reason of the attractive features of the climate there, are pouring into the State of Arizona by the hundreds—not by the scores—and the pathetic incident which the Senator from Iowa so eloquently depicted is being repeated forty times over in Arizona.

On November 2 and on November 3 I laid this situation before the Senate, and pointed out that the Sixty-sixth Congress passed an act, which was approved March 4, 1921, appropriating $18,600,000 for hospitalization of returned soldiers, and I tried to point out that that sum had been entirely absorbed, or allocated. There has just been placed into my hands a statement of the Treasury Department showing that of that sum of $18,600,000 there have been spent in the equipment and the building of hospitals throughout the United States $11,059,000, many of the hospitals being already completed, and most if not all are over 40 per cent completed, and that $6,150,000 has been allocated or distributed to other hospitals and must be used for the particular purpose to which it is allocated, leaving a balance on hand of $1,391,000, which the Secretary of the Treasury holds as a reserve, fearing there might be a breakdown or a defect of some sort in the program of building already contracted for. So there is a very real need, an extreme emergency, existing, and $16,000,000 are necessary and should be appropriated within 30 days to take care of the hospitalization and demands of vocational training for ex-service men.

Mr. President, when I received the governor's telegram, I interviewed Director Forbes and said, "Can this be true?" He said, "My dear Senator, it is lamentably true, but I have neither the money nor the authority to cope with the situation. Will you go to the President and lay these facts before him? I do not know what Director Forbes's politics may be; I suppose he is Republican. I know he has at least given this Arizona matter his attention. Soldiers by the score are without hospitalization and without the vocational training which they demand and should have, and so far as in me lies I will not permit the questions of hospitilization and a bonus for soldiers be made party questions.

See what happened to the Versailles treaty when it was made a party question. Let us not bring these great questions down to the level of partisanship.

If we are sincere friends of the soldiers—and we all are, I suppose, one not more than the other—we can prove that sincerity by acting upon the report which a committee of the Senate has made, a committee presided over by Senator Sutherland of West Virginia. On that committee are the Senator from Massachusets [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. That committee has reported that the emergency is desperate, and that this $16,000,- 000 ought to be appropriated for vocational training and hospitalization.

I thank the Senator from Missouri for yielding to me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I agree with practically all the Senator from Arizona has said, and I do not want to interject politics into this question; but I do want, if possible in three or four minutes, to draw together, as I said, the threads of the debate.

When the bonus bill was brought forward—the identical bill which I have introduced as a part of this amendment—and when it was reported to the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] it was declared to be a wise and a provident measure, and practically every Senator was ready to support it. It was not then regarded as a partisan question merely because it happened to be reported by a member of the Republican Party. But when the identical question, in the same verbiage, is brought forward from this side of the Chamber we are accused of playing politics.

How can we play politics with such a question? The only way we could gain any political advantage in connection with the proposition would be from the fact that it is a matter of such merit that it will meet with the commendation of the voters. That being the case, and if that be the case, you can remove all politics from this question by your votes, which you will be permitted to cast in the next few minutes. If you see fit to vote against a proposition which is so just that you on the other side of the Chamber reported it yourselves and which is so just that it will meet with the general commendation of the American people, you may make it a political question by casting a political vote. That is all there is to the question of injecting politics into this matter.

We are told, Mr. President, that this bill would not relieve the necessities of the particular soldier to whom the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] referred in his very touching address, and that therefore we should not consider the amendment at all; that it could not become effective, owing to the condition of our Treasury, until next July, and that therefore we ought to do nothing. It is contended that because it will not meet the emergencies of some individual who is suffering at present we shall not prepare to take care of the sufferings of the future. That is a very peculiar argument.

If next July or August some soldier is hungry, or some soldier needs help, or some soldier has been wounded and has been turned out of the hospital without any money, and this shall be the law, he will get some help from the Government; but if this is not agreed to now, or in the meantime, it will be little satisfaction to that soldier to be told that the reason why the Senate did not agree to the amendment at this time was because it did not apply to somebody who had suffered before the bill came on for a vote.

We are told that this amendment would not produce results as soon as some bills that rest in some one's imagination might afford some relief. We present an amendment which promises relief as soon as any known revenue or source of revenue can be drawn upon, the very bill that was reported by the Senator from North Dakota, with the approval of a unanimous vote of the Senate Finance Committee.

We bring it in in the same language, and you stand there and tell us that the bill ought to be voted down because it does not take effect soon enough, and yet you have brought forward no bill.

An amendment is suggested to get this money from another source, to wit, from the interest or principal that may be paid to us by European nations. The answer will be made to that that we may not get the money soon enough to meet the emergency, and therefore that should be killed.

But what has been proposed in lieu of these measures? We have tried to do something and we have tried to do it at the present time, and we are told that our proposition should be killed because it will not become effective soon enough. We are told that by Senators who bring forward nothing at the present time—nothing whatever.

When the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] rose and shook his, I would not say his gory locks, but his silver locks, at this side of the Chamber, and who asserted that the Republican Party would take care of this in its own time and its own way, from what source of revenue he proposed to get the money, he having declined to get it from the excess-profits tax, a source that we now point out, having declined to get it from interest on foreign loans, a source that will be pointed out; and when I asked him what the source of his money will be he tells us with a lordly air that that is a question which will be answered in due time in the future.

Well, I answer it now, that you can get the money by continuing a tax that is now levied on the men who are profiteering upon the country; and the only reason that can be advanced for voting against the bonus bill is that you prefer to serve the profiteers rather than to serve the soldiers. That is the solitary reason that can be offered.

We were asked how the soldier to whom the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] referred could be found penniless upon the street. It is not difficult to answer that. A man wounded, sent to the hospital, recovering from his wounds and not under 10 per cent of disability is turned out on the street. If he has not money when he is turned out, he finds himself, of course, without money when he is out.

This is not an isolated case. I had some occasion to investigate the great hospital at St. Louis, or, rather, the very inefficient hospital at St. Louis. It is inefficient, but I do not think there should be criticism, because they had to accept such conditions as could be obtained. I learned of instance after instance where soldiers were discharged from that hospital as no longer needing hospital aid who went out without sufficient clothing. Of course, if they had had a little bonus to draw from they could have gotten the clothing.

So the instance cited by the Senator from Iowa is not a fictitious case. It requires no explanation. A man may be wounded 17 times by shrapnel and still an Army physician may say that he is not under 10 per cent of total disability; and even if he were allowed 10 per cent of total disability, his pension might be entirely inadequate to support a wife and baby. But I do not think we need waste much time about that. The case stated by the Senator from Iowa can be multiplied by 10,000 cases.

Mr. President, here is the situation in a nutshell: The tax upon those who have made very great profits will amount to $450,000,000 this year. It is proposed to relieve those who pay that tax entirely from the tax. The soldiers' bonus will cost less than $450,000,000 this year. It is proposed to refuse them consideration at this time, to leave them to the hope of some relief in the future. I propose to continue the tax upon the profiteer and to give it to the soldier now. True, there will not be enough accrued to make payments until July, but the sooner we begin getting the money the sooner we may disburse the money.

It has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin that the proposition to continue the tax upon profiteers has been rejected by the Senate. So has the sales tax been rejected by the Senate, and by a much more decisive vote and a vote much later in the session. Where, then, is the money to come from? The Senator from Wisconsin declined to answer, and he will not answer because he can not answer.

Now, Mr. President, I can not speak for everyone, but so far as I am concerned I am ready to submit this question to a vote.

On the pending amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have no desire unduly to prolong the discussion, but inasmuch as practically all the time has been occupied by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, I feel perfectly free to take at least a few moments to pay my respects to some of the Senators who have this night addressed the assemblage in the galleries.

It comes somewhat late to admonish us now that there is to be no politics in this question. My friend from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] very kindly and very energetically and very patriotically requested that there should be no politics in connection with the consideration of this problem. His request comes too late. Politics is already in it, injected into it not on this side of the aisle, but on the other side. He did not rise to make his request that we drop politics until after the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] had poured out the vials of his wrath upon the head of every Republican in this body and had inveighed in most caustic fashion against the course and conduct of the President of the United States. Therefore I do not deem it inappropriate that some response should be made along perhaps similar lines.

Assuredly, there was no politics at the beginning of the war. Certainly when the soldiers marched out under the flaunting flags of the Republic they went out not as Democrats, not as Republicans, but as patriots. Assuredly, they did not come from the East or the West or the North or the South, but they came as Americans all. There was no more thought of politics because the President of the United States was a Democrat than there was thought of politics because the gallant general at the head of the great armed host of the United States was a Republican.

No politics was ever injected into the discussion of this question until after the President of the United States had appeared and made his admonitory speech as the President of the United States discharging his sworn duty, talking to the Senate of the Republic. Then politics came in.

It has been asserted and reasserted, iterated and reiterated with damnable iteration, that the President of the United States had stepped aside from the true dignity of his office in order to browbeat the Senate of the United States and bulldoze it into a position that was unworthy of this great body. Senators, I need but call your attention to the fact that the President did not assume the initiative in this matter. After they began to study the financial situation, Senators first called upon the President of the United States. After we had comprehended the fiscal condition of the country and had seen the state of the revenues and came to a full realization of the situation, we knew that some action had to be taken. We went in knots and in groups and almost as a body to the President of the United States, and over and over again invited him to come here, because when the President speaks the people listen, and when the President came here to tell us the situation the Nation heard, and when the Nation heard the Senate of the United States responded to their demands.

Ah, I do not forget, Senators, that when the roll was called on the vote to recommit the adjusted compensation measure to the Committee on Finance, Senators DIAL, GLASS, KING, MYERS, SIMMONS, SWANSON, UNDERWOOD, and WILLIAMS voted in the affirmative. Democrats all, they voted to recommit the bill. Were they in the clutches of the octopus? Were they doing the bidding of Wall Street? Were they upon their knees in the presence of the golden calf? Not only that, but Senators SHIELDS, POMERENE, and SMITH of South Carolina were all paired in favor of recommitting the bonus bill to the Committee on Finance.

So that 11 Democratic Senators, good and true, almost one-third of your whole membership, voted with us to recommit the measure to the Committee on Finance, and yet, because of that recommittal, we are now charged with being the suppliant tools of Wall Street, having no independence of our own, and seeking only to cringe and crawl in the presence of wealth. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Kentucky that he look well to his own partisans before he embarks upon a campaign of criticism against his neighbors.

Now, Senators, my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said that he proposes to pay the compensation provided for in his amendment from the imposition of excess-profits taxes, and that such taxes will be paid by next July. Under the provisions of the pending revenue bill the excess-profits tax is continued until the 1st of January, 1922. The excess-profits taxes are paid after the end of the full year. Taxes on profits can not be paid until it is ascertained what the profits are, and profits are not calculated until the end of the year. The first installment of excess-profits taxes out of which the Senator could possibly pay a dollar of the bonus or compensation provided by his amendment will not be paid until March, 1923, and that is the beneficence which my friend from Missouri expects to extend to the mangled and palsied soldiers of the Republic who carried the flag to victory and whose condition has excited such lachrymose demonstrations on this occasion. If the Senator will possess his soul in patience, long before that time shall come the Republican Party, with a Republican President and a Republican Senate and a Republican House, will pass a measure that will give the measure of relief to each soldier that his needs justify and fully satisfy the just demands of every lover of the defenders of our flag.

Mr. REED. Might I ask the Senator to enlighten us, since he is talking about taking the tax off excess war profits, as to where he is going to get the money?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I will answer that question. It is a far readier proposition to relieve the soldiers that I have to suggest than one that would take effect in March, 1923.

Mr. REED. Well, let us hear it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am for the sales tax, I do not hesitate to say.

Mr. REED. That is what I thought. The Senator proposes to put the same tax——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am not going to get into an argument about the sales tax, because I have not the time. I have already argued that question for an hour, and it is not pertinent to the purposes of this speech for me to pursue it further.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. One of the scandals of the Democratic administration, as we all know, was the manner in which the Federal agencies for the relief of the ex-service men were managed. By no stretch of the imagination can those scandals and the consequent neglect be charged to the Republican Party. The Republican Congress which was elected in 1918 and assembled in 1919 voted these agencies $778,626,187, as follows: The War Risk Bureau, $472,615,000; hospitalization and hospital construction, $210,011,187; vocational education, $186,000,000. All of this money, every dollar of it, as my eloquent friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has said, was disbursed by the Democratic administration, and therefore whatever scandal attached to the use made of it and whatever incompetency was manifested in its expenditure was purely Democratic, and in no instance chargeable to the Republican Party.

The attacks which, from the political standpoint, have been directed against the Republican majority in connection with the soldiers' bonus proposal have been led, first, by the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], my good friend, whom I do not see in his seat to-night; by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and others, who confront me here. They all believe in State rights; they all advocate the doctrine of State sovereignty; they all deplore the growth of autocratic power in Washington; and yet in what single State has any Democratic legislature provided any act of relief by way of a cash bonus for the soldiers of the Nation?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in the State of Missouri they have voted the soldiers a very large bonus.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the State of Missouri has a Republican governor, a Republican legislature, and they are the ones who are responsible for what happened in Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the political condition in Missouri prevails by virtue of a very sad accident, which will not be repeated.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I know nothing about the sadness of the accident, but I know that in Missouri there is a Republican legislature, composed of a Republican senate and a Republican house; and I know that 16 of the acts which the soldiers wanted have been passed in that State, all of them under a Republican governor and a Republican legislature, and not one has been passed by a Democratic agency in that State.

Senators, 13 States have voted their ex-service men cash bonuses in the aggregate sum of $178,500,000, and the payment of these bonuses under State enactment is either under way or practically completed. The legislatures of six other States have authorized the payment of cash bonuses to their ex-service men, subject, under the law, to a popular referendum. The referendum in each case is to be held this year, and many of them have been held. The total sum involved in these State appropriations approximates $160,000,000.

Still other States, as well as some of those voting cash bonuses, have enacted laws providing for the vocational training of ex-service men in their respective State institutions or for free scholarships in State normal schools and colleges; still others have provided for the free settlement of public lands owned by the States; for sick benefits to disabled ex-service men and death benefits to their dependents; for exemption from State taxes up to a fixed amount; for loans to obtain education, to purchase homes, farm machinery, and live stock; for free hospitalization, and so forth.

The 13 States which have voted cash bonuses and are paying them and the amount each State has voted are as follows:

Maine, $3,000,000; Massachusetts, $20,000,000; Michigan, $30,000,000; Minnesota, $20,000,000; New Hampshire, $1,000,000; New Jersey, $12,000,000; New York, $45,000,000; Rhode Island, $2,500,000; South Dakota, $6,000,000; Vermont, $3,000,000; Washington, $11,000,000; Wisconsin, $15,000,000; making a total of $168,500,000.

To this sum must be added Oregon's contribution, which has just been provided, payment of which will commence in a few weeks. Under the Oregon statute each ex-service man is to receive $15 cash for each month of service. It is estimated that Oregon will pay not less than $10,000,000. North Dakota has voted $25 a month for each month of service.

Six State legislatures have authorized bond issues to pay cash bonuses, subject to popular referendum. The amount of the issue in each case is as follows:

Illinois, $55,000,000; Iowa, $22,000,000; Kansas, $25,000,000; Missouri, $15,000,000; Montana, $1,500,000; Ohio enough to pay $10 a month to each man in the service, estimated to involve an expenditure of not less than $40,000,000. The aggregate of these authorizations is $160,000,000.

So, Mr. President, these States, all of them Republican, through their governors and their legislatures, have authorized the payment of cash bonuses amounting to $338,000,000; but not one dollar has even been authorized to be expended for any of these great patriotic purposes by any Democratic legislature in the whole domain of the Republic; yet Senators on the other side rise and have—I was about to say—the effrontery to charge that we are against the soldier; that they alone can take care of the mangled and the wounded who suffered their wounds fighting in defense of the Republic.

Now, Senators, what other aspect is there to the situation? The American Legion has demanded in the various States 28 different acts of legislation. What are they? They have demanded that November 11 be made a legal holiday; they have demanded a law for the protection of the legion emblem; a State civil service preference law for veterans; legion control of boxing; taxation or poll-tax exemption; educational assistance for veterans; a soldiers' land settlement law; assistance to veterans buying homes; State relief fund for needy veterans; provision for veterans in State soldiers' homes; State loan fund for veterans; admission to State hospitals; special hospitals for insane or tuberculous veterans; authorizing public expenditure for memorials; State medal for veterans; history of State's part in war, records of soldiers, and so forth; law for recording discharge certificates; grants for funeral expenses of veterans, gravestones, and so forth; establishment of veterans' welfare commission; law to assist veterans to obtain employment; exemption of legion property from taxation; appropriation to help legion meet expenses, and so forth; parole of erring young men or veterans to legion; use of public buildings, armories, and so forth, for legion meetings; authorizing State payment of Memorial Day expenses; petitions forwarded by legislature to Congress; laws barring orientals from land holdings; and cash compensation.

Those are the 28 acts that the American Legion has asked shall be passed through the various State legislatures.

On the paper which I hold in my hand the first State my eye falls upon is the State of Alabama. What has Alabama done to meet the desires of the Legion? Of all the 28 not one has ever been passed by the legislature of that State—not one. Yet my friend the junior Senator from that State [Mr. HEFLIN] rises here and charges that the Republicans in Congress are opposed to helping the soldier. Why, I ask, will not my friend take the beam out of his own eye before he undertakes to remove the mote that is in our eyes?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I beg the Senator's pardon, but I can not yield. I will ask him to let me proceed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wanted to ask a question. Does the Senator believe that the generous action on the part of the States to which he has referred affords any excuse for nonaction on the part of the Federal Government?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, nonaction! Let my good friend possess his soul in peace. When we have ordered the finances of the Nation after we shall have passed the pending revenue legislation, after we shall definitely determine how much money is to be poured into the Treasury, then, when we are upon a strong footing, we will enact the proper bonus legislation; we will have the money with which to pay it; and we will not oppress capital in the action we shall take, but will open the factories and start anew the smoke from the stacks all over this Republic as the harbinger of a new prosperity for the Nation.

But let me go on. I see my friend and namesake from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], genial and brilliant, sitting over there. How many of these 28 acts have been considered and passed by the Legislature of Georgia? Not one of them has even been given consideration—not one.

I come to Mississippi, represented in part by my genial companion, whom I so highly esteem [Mr. HARRISON], who is not present to-night. How many of these 28 acts have been considered by the Legislature of Mississippi? Not one has been given even a moment's consideration by the legislature of that State. And so on down the list. Texas defeated the cash bonus.

Now, I look into the face of my good friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] and I ask what did Tennessee do? I will tell you what Tennessee did. It defeated the cash bonus. I will say to my friend, to be entirely frank with him, that it did concede eight of the measures the legion wanted, but so far as the cash bonus was concerned they defeated it utterly. The State of my friend, believing in State rights and in State sovereignty and opposed to national autocracy voted, through its legislature, against a bonus proposal; and yet he comes to the General Government and demands that its autocratic action be further extended and a bonus provided at the hands of the Government of the United States.

Now, let me go on. What about North Carolina, the State represented by my two splendid friends, Senator SIMMONS and Senator OVERMAN; Senator SIMMONS, the leading Democrat on the Finance Committee, a man of great courage and splendid capacity, and one for whom I have admiration as a member of that committee, who had the courage to vote to recommit the adjusted compensation bill because he thought the finances of the Nation did not justify its enactment, and he was not willing to play politics in order to win votes. I ask again, What about North Carolina? North Carolina enacted three of the provisions, and what are they? One authorizing public expenditures for memorials; another, State medals for veterans; and, third, a law for recording discharge certificates. Far better that than nothing; but, after all, not measuring up to the demands which these Senators come here and make of the American Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the table to which I have referred in the course of my remarks, being a summary of State legislation affecting the World War veterans, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the table will be printed in the RECORD.

The table referred to is as follows:

[1] Democratic States.

Provisions for war memorials and for the recording of veterans' discharge certificates have been made in 29 States each, according to the above chart. Other measures which have been adopted by more than half the States are: Use of public buildings, especially armories, for Legion meetings, 27 States, and protection of the Legion emblem, 26 States. Twenty-one States admit veterans to State hospitals under various provisions, and the same number have established grants for veterans' funeral expenses and have addressed petitions to Congress on behalf of Legion national legislation. Other measures affecting the veteran adopted in 10 or more States are: Preparation of war history, 20; Nov. 11 a holiday, 15; civil service preference, 16; educational aid, 15; relief fund for needy, 15; provision for veterans in soldiers' homes, 14; cash compensation, 14; special hospitals for insane and tuberculous, 13; exemption of Legion property from taxation, 12; medals, 10.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, as I have demonstrated, every dollar of the cash bonuses so far granted to the soldiers of the Nation has been authorized by Republican legislatures, and not one penny has been appropriated by any Democratic legislature under the national flag. Therefore, Senators of the minority, before you undertake to charge us with politics, clean your own house, please, if you will excuse the expression; I do not mean it in an offensive way. Let me tell you that, as Republican legislatures in various States have upheld the hands of the Nation's defenders, so before long we will enact the bonus bill, and we will pass it through a Republican Congress, and in all the country, not alone Republican legislatures but as well the Republican Congress of the National Government will once more exalt American patriotism through the acts of a patriotic Republican Congress, as Republican Congresses are always patriotic.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the only thing the Republican Party has given to the soldiers was a holiday; and when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] says that they will hold up the hands of the soldiers, they will hold up 4,000,000 empty hands. That is what the Republican Party has done.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. They gave the soldiers a holiday and they gave all the workmen a holiday, too.

Mr. HEFLIN. Not only have they given the soldiers a holiday, but they gave 6,000,000 of men who had employment under a Democratic administration a holiday.

They tell us that we have injected politics into this thing; that because a Republican President came to this Chamber and asked to have this bill recommitted to a committee room to die, because Democrats dared to stand up and speak for the soldiers, we were indulging in politics. Shall we on this side sit silent while the Republican Party votes to death a measure that seeks to give justice to the soldiers, because some Republican politician will charge us with playing politics? Which side is the politics on—the party in this Chamber that votes to do justice by the soldier, or the party that votes to kill the measure, and then to relieve profiteers of $450,000,000 of taxation?

You voted to take $20,000,000 of taxation off the big holding companies. You tried to remove $75,000,000 of taxation from individuals with net incomes of $68,000 and more, and we defeated you, and saved twenty-odd millions, I believe, of that sum.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] reminds us that Republican State legislatures have voted bonuses to the soldiers. What an indictment against his party! The States of the Union look upon the G. O. P. on dress parade, and see it failing and refusing to do anything for the soldier, so the States back home are driven to it to keep want and distress from haunting every home. What an indictment against your party. And then you accuse us of playing politics.

Mr. President, I have no patience with the speech of anybody, whether it is on this side or on the other, who wants to repudiate the debate upon this question. How would the soldiers feel if nobody had risen to plead their cause, when they have just adjourned in convention at Kansas City, condemning your President, condemning your Secretary of the Treasury as the greatest war profiteer in modern times?

I do not care whether you think it is politics or not; I condemn it, and I condemn you, and I defy you. I will speak for the soldier. You can call it politics if you please. If the time ever comes when I can not condemn the money changers who hold sway over many in this Chamber, who have influence enough to make you take your hands off of $450,000,000 of taxation, to relieve the big holding companies—if I ever reach the time when I have to achieve a seat in this Chamber from a sovereign State in that way, I will walk out of it. If I had a drop of that kind of blood in my body, I would bare my breast to the surgeon's knife and bid him let it out.

Talk about truckling to big interests! You are going to do something for the soldier after a while, "in the sweet by-and-by." He wants you to do something for him in the distressing now-and-now.

The Senator tells us that the soldier would not get this money for two or three years. I want to say to him now that if we were to pass this measure to-night, the fact that the country knows that we have put it on the statute books would enable every one of the soldiers who has a claim to go and present it at a bank somewhere, and get some money on it to buy food with this winter and a shelter at some place. But, no, Senators, you want to postpone it. You want to put it off. You get up here and ask us to do that in the National Capital, in the Senate of the United States, boastingly!

My eloquent and able friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], probably the ablest debater on your side, except the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], able and brilliant and powerful as he always is, can almost make black look like white with his eloquence and his power. I am exceedingly fond of him personally. I served with him for years in the House of Representatives, and we used to sing together when the session adjourned; but I never heard him sing such a mournful tune as I heard him sing here to-night.

Ah, Mr. President, the Senator boasts in his place about what one State after another has done, and he says the Democratic States have not done it. When did it behoove the States to pension national soldiers? That is an obligation that the Federal Government owes. Under what flag did these boys fight, coming out from the various Commonwealths of the Union? They marshaled beneath that flag, and marched on the battle fields 3,000 miles away, and achieved victory, and baptized the soil of France with their blood, and covered that flag with the glory of their valor.

Now, back home, poverty stricken, 500,000 of them, they must call upon the States to give them a pittance to keep them from having to beg for their bread, and you boast of it upon this floor—proud, pompous G. O. P., the agent and kindly friend of the purse-proud profiteer! Oh, it is a pitiable situation, Mr. President!

I do not care to detain the Senate longer. Let me say this one thing:

I do not intend without protest that you shall make a football of the destiny of these soldiers, kicking them around from time to time and place to place, and, finally, when you have let out all the big taxpayers, resort to a sales tax which puts a tax upon the poor man's breakfast table, upon all the necessities of life, taxing every consumer in the Republic from the cradle to the grave. Is it possible that then you will bear the soldier in front of you and say: "We ask this sales tax in his name"? After you have affected his mood, after you have broken his morale, after you have dwindled him in the scale of being as a proud, brave, chivalrous American soldier, will you hold him up as an object of pity and beg the American people for his sake to put a sales tax upon the necessities of life?

God pity your party! Is this the doctrine that you ask us to accept?

> Rather cast me back into pagan night,
> To take my chances with Socrates for bliss,
> Than be the Christian of a faith like this!

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask for about five minutes of time on this subject.

I am opposed to this proposal, as I have been opposed to it from the beginning; and I am still opposed to it for the same reason—because I am opposed to the principle of it. I think it contrary to the spirit of our institutions and form of government to tax all of the people for the benefit of a part of the people. I have always been opposed to that principle in every form.

The thing that is now proposed to be done never has been done in the history of our country. It was not done for the soldiers of the Revolutionary War, the soldiers of the War of 1812–1814, the soldiers of the Mexican War, the soldiers of the Civil War, the soldiers of the Spanish-American War, and the idea of doing it for the soldiers of the World War was not conceived until Congress awoke to the fact that there were 4,000,000 men enrolled in the American Army for that war, nine-tenths of whom, I dare say, are voters. Then Congress suddenly conceived the idea of granting them a bonus at the expense of the people. It originated in a Republican House of Representatives.

It was introduced in the House of the Sixty-sixth Congress by a Republican Representative, and I believe there has been politics in this movement from the beginning, in both parties, on both sides of this Chamber, and in both branches of Congress. I believe there was politics in it when the first bill originated in a Republican House of Representatives, and when the Republican Senators, aided and abetted by many of the Democratic Senators, were about to pass it in this body, until the President of the United States performed a courageous duty and came here and protested. I think there was politics in it when the Republicans of this body were right on the verge of passing it, and I think there is equally politics in it now, when the proposal comes from the Democratic side of this Chamber.

If none of the 4,000,000 soldiers who served this country during the World War were voters, I doubt exceedingly if there would be 20 Members of Congress in both branches who would favor a bonus for them. The Congress which succeeded the Revolutionary War did not take such a step. The Congress which succeeded the second war with England did not take such a step. The Congress which succeeded the Mexican War did not take such a step. The Congress which succeeded the Civil War did nothing of the kind.

The Congress which succeeded the Spanish-American War did nothing of the kind. It is a strange thing if this Congress, the Sixty-seventh Congress, is so much more patriotic and can rise to much higher and loftier ideals of appreciation and patriotism than all of the other Congresses which I have mentioned, and I do not believe it. I do not think the people of the country believe it. I do not think the former soldiers believe it. I believe the people of the country know there is politics in this. I believe that the soldiers themselves know it. My objection to the attitude of Republican Senators in this matter is that practically all of them who speak on the subject do not set their faces as flint against the principle of the proposition, but they all promise to do this at some other time; just await, they say, a more appropriate time. "A time is coming when we will do it," they say. That is not the reason why I shall vote against this proposition to-night. The reason why I shall vote against it is the reason that has actuated me from the beginning, and it is that I am opposed to the principle of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the principle is so obnoxious to the Senator, why did he vote to give each soldier $60 when he was discharged?

Mr. MYERS. I thought I thrashed that out with the Senator from Arkansas some time ago, and I will give him the same answer I gave then. I have not looked up the RECORD, and I am not positive that I voted for it, but I think I did; and if I did not I should have done it. It was because the soldiers were turned out of the Army and left with nothing, if they had saved nothing, and many of them needed a little money with which to get home and look around for work; it was on the same principle as giving them a suit of clothes upon discharge.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. Certainly; with pleasure, always.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator must remember that the Government paid the soldiers' way home, so the money would not have been necessary to pay their way home.

Mr. MYERS. Undoubtedly there were many of them who had saved no money in the service, and they needed a few dollars upon arriving at home, while looking for work.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Government gave them their tickets home.

Mr. MYERS. I know the Government paid their way home. That was proper.

Mr. CARAWAY. So the Senator did not vote to give them the money to send them home, did he?

Mr. MYERS. I suppose the money was appropriated by Congress. As to the two months' extra pay, I say that was simply to give them a little means until they could get employment. The Senator from Arkansas seems to see no difference between giving men a few dollars and turning loose millions and billions of dollars. His sense of measurement in regard to money matters seems to be very obtuse.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is just the amount, then, that makes the principle? It is not the principle itself?

Mr. MYERS. I say there is a great deal of difference between taxing the people to raise hundreds of millions of dollars to donate to a certain class of people and giving the soldiers a few dollars in order that they may have a little money in hand when they get home and until they can look around and get employment. Yes; I say there is a difference to the taxpayers.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do I understand the Senator to say, then, that he objects to taxing the people; that it is not a question of principle?

Mr. MYERS. I object to the principle——

Mr. CARAWAY. Does the Senator object to making a man pay an excess-profits tax?

Mr. MYERS. I object to the principle of taxing all the people, by excess profits or any other method, for the benefit of a part of the people. That is the principle to which I object. If this proposed action is a patriotic duty, then it is a strange thing that the same patriotic duty did not occur to the Congresses which succeeded all the other wars in which we have ever engaged. I believe in the most liberal and generous appropriations for hospitals and rehabilitation measures and vocational education, for the payment of adequate compensation to those who suffered wounds or incurred disease—the maimed, crippled, disabled.

This Congress and the preceding Congress have enacted very liberal laws along those lines, and I believe, if necessary, in enacting even more liberal laws; but I am opposed to the principle of taxing the people for the benefit of able-bodied men. When those laws for the benefit of returned disabled soldiers were enacted it was understood they were to be in lieu of pensions and other pecuniary benefits.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] read a list of 11 Democratic Senators who voted a few weeks ago against the bonus by voting to return the bill to the Senate Committee on Finance. I was one of them; and whatever the other 10 Democrats who so voted on that occasion, such of them as are now present, may do, I shall vote the same way to-night, and for the same reason.

Mr. CARAWAY obtained the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, will the votes upon these amendments have to be taken before 12 o'clock?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that it was the intention of the Senate that they should be.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, Mr. President, will not the Chair take notice of the hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to warn the Senate that the time was approaching for a vote to be taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Chair hold that if we do not vote upon both the amendments before 12 o'clock we can not vote upon them in Committee of the Whole after that time; that is to say, on Monday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has made no ruling on that.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think there will be any objection to the Senate voting a little after 12 o'clock, and I would like to hear the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am going to take just a moment of the Senate's time. I do not understand the reasoning of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. I have for him a very high regard, but I can not understand how he can say that it is entirely proper to pay a soldier $60 but that to give him $350 is playing politics. There is absolutely nothing to differentiate one case from the other. If it was right to give him that, it is right to give him this, if we think his services to the country were worth that much. If Senators think their service was not worth so much, if you think it was better to let the people at home earn tremendous fortunes by profiteering, and that you should now shield them from being compelled to give a few dollars of their profits to compensate the soldiers in some slight degree, God bless your souls, you are going to show it to-night.

There are just two classes of people to be affected by this amendment: On one side are 4,500,000 boys whom all of you but one voted to compel, if he was not willing to go, to leave home and offer himself, if need be, to die for his country, and you said it was for civilization, and you stayed here at home and profited by his sacrifices. His interest is one side of the issue.

On the other side are men and corporations who are now making excess profits, men who are getting an unholy and an unrighteous profit; and you are going to say by your vote to-night either that you think the soldier merits well of this Congress or that you think the profiteer does. You can not stay with both of them to-night. Fortunately, you have to face that issue and say: "So help me, Almighty God, I believe I register a more patriotic vote when I vote to shield the profiteer than when I vote to compensate in some way the soldiers for the sacrifices they made, however inadequate it may be."

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator from Montana has said that there are no politics in this question.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is all politics.

Mr. STANLEY. He is right in a way. There is not so much politics in it, but there is a lot of plutocracy in it. It is not a question between the Democratic and Republican Parties so much as it is a question between God and man. ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CARAWAY. Those gentlemen on the other side who shout so lustily for a vote now want to let the profiteers, who contributed to their campaigns and from whom they expect to get contributions in the future, know that they stand ready and willing and anxious to cast a vote to shield them from having to part with $450,000,000.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let us vote!

Mr. CARAWAY. Possess your souls in patience. The masters who sent you here will know, when you have had an opportunity to record your votes, that you have been loyal to them. They certainly can spare you a minute of time. Do they drive you so incessantly and so hard that you must shout for an opportunity to vote for them?

You can not dodge this issue. You can not fool anybody by your action. There is but one man in the Senate who will honestly vote against the soldiers' bonus amendment and believe that he is doing his duty, and that is the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and there is not a man who lives who can follow his reasoning. I know he is honest, because I know him.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, one man can; I can.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; the Senator can not himself; he can not track himself. He knows why he does it, but to save his soul he can not tell anybody else why he does it. I know he is honest; I know the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle will register their votes in behalf of their masters; they are going to vote to relieve profiteers. Now, without your shouting, you may vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the roll will be called.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. On this question he has released me from the pair, and I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] is necessarily absent on account of illness. If present, that Senator would vote "nay." I have agreed to pair with him on this question and in his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], who is called away on account of a death in his family. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who if present would vote "yea." I vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but I am informed that he would vote on this question the same way I shall vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent. The Senator from Connecticut if present would vote as I shall vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. NORRIS's name was called). The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is detained at home on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. If the Senator from Nebraska were able to be here and to vote, he would vote "yea." I understand that if the Senator from Minnesota were able to be here and to vote, would vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. That Senator is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer, and hence I am unable to vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when Mr. SHIELDS's name was called). The senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The Senator from Tennessee is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent on account of illness, to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and vote "yea."

Mr. STANLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], who is absent. I understand that if present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." Under the understanding which I have with that Senator I feel at liberty to vote upon this question. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is unavoidably absent. He is paired on this question with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If present, the Senator from Texas would vote "yea."

Mr. CARAWAY. My colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I am informed that if that Senator were present, he would vote as I would vote on this proposition; therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired on this question with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If the Senator from Massachusetts were present and not paired, he would vote "nay." If the Senator from Texas were present and not paired, he would vote "yea."

I also wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

So Mr. REED'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there are two remaining amendments, one offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the other offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. I do not understand just what construction the Chair has placed or intends to place upon the procedure of the Senate in connection with those amendments. If they are in order, I would suggest that they be now voted on.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that at 12 o'clock we are to take a recess; that on Monday we can offer any amendment that we see fit; and that if the bonus amendment offered by myself is not voted upon to-night before 12 o'clock it would be in order on Monday. That is my understanding. I ask for the ruling of the Chair upon that point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already stated that there is no doubt the Senate understood that all amendments on this subject were to be taken up and disposed of to-day. If the Senator moves his amendment, the Chair will rule on it when it is presented.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I shall not agree to that. That amendment is on the table, and if it is not in order under the 10-minute rule on Monday I shall offer it when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Nevada, as he rose first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada will state his question of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. The unanimous-consent agreement on this point reads as follows:

> It is further agreed that when such amendments are disposed of, and at not later than 12 o'clock midnight, the Senate will take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Monday, November 7, 1921.

That is the unanimous-consent agreement, and can not be set aside. The point of order is that there is nothing now in order except a recess.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Chair will permit me, the Senator from Nevada has made the same point of order that I intended to make. Under the unanimous-consent agreement it is perfectly plain to my mind that there is nothing now to do except to take a recess until Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to state that I shall not offer my amendment, of course, under the ruling of the Chair. I submit to that ruling. I shall offer the amendment in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has made no ruling that the Senator could not offer his amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Chair had made a ruling that I could submit it on Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair made no such ruling.

Mr. PENROSE. In the confusion I misunderstood the ruling of the Chair. I now ask that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock on Monday morning next.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me to ask unanimous consent to put a short statement in the RECORD?

Mr. PENROSE. No; I can not yield. The hour is getting late.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that the Senate shall at this hour take a recess. Under that agreement the Senate will now stand in recess until 10 o'clock Monday morning.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock midnight) the Senate took a recess until Monday, November 7, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, November 5, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in Heaven, with the light of the morning renew the sunshine of our spirits and the childhood of our hearts. Remind us that life is redeemed by sacrifice and service. Revive within us the sympathy that feels another's grief, the sweet charity that weaves another's hope, and the love that shares another's gladness. The Lord help us to forgive our enemies and bear no malice. May our faith in God, man, and our country always be as shinning lights that can not be blown out. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS ON MONDAY AND TUESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I stated that in view of the fact that Tuesday will be election day, and that there are important elections in a number of States requiring the presence of Members at home, I might at the proper time ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess Monday or Tuesday, or adjourn from to-day until Wednesday.

The difficulty now confronting us in carrying out that kind of a program lies in the fact that the Senate may pass the tax bill late to-night, and if we should adjourn until Wednesday they would not be able to message the bill over to us until that day. That is not likely, however. There is a possibility that the tax bill may be acted upon Monday, and that it would be messaged over on Tuesday if we were in session. I think the House should be in session when the Senate is ready to send the tax bill over to us. A little later in the day I think we may be able to determine when the Senate is likely to conclude its consideration of the tax bill, and if later it seems probable that that bill will not reach the House until Wednesday I may ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess Monday and Tuesday. But, on the other hand, if it seems probable that the tax bill will reach us on Tuesday, while it has been generally understood that there will be no important business transacted on that day, I am not sure that we should stand in recess Tuesday. I think we should be in a position to receive the bill and give an opportunity for its printing. I make this statement in order that gentlemen may have in mind that later in the day I may submit a request relative to Monday and Tuesday along the line suggested.

EXERCISES ON ARMISTICE DAY.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman takes his seat, in view of the likelihood that the House may not be in session on Monday and Tuesday, I think it would be well to have some definite statement made with reference to the details of our participation in the ceremonies on November 11. Will the gentleman have a statement made later in the day by whoever is in charge of the program on the part of the House or have a statement inserted in the RECORD for the benefit of Members?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that I had hoped that the officer who was assigned from the War Department to attend to the details of the participation by the House in those ceremonies would be able to give us a statement to-day of the program of procedure; but I now understand that he is out of the city and will not be back until Monday. But not later than Monday I trust that we may be able to make an announcement from the floor of the House, or if we are not in session have a statement mailed to each Member as to the procedure.

In a general way, as I understand it, we will be expected—and it will be necessary to ask unanimous consent for that—to meet in the Hall of the House at 8 o'clock sharp on the morning of the 11th to march from here in a body, such Members as desire to march, into the Rotunda, and from there take our places in the general line of march to the White House.

I understand it has been suggested that the Members have their automobiles parked back of the State, War, and Navy Building in the region of the Ellipse, in order that they may take them there when they drop out of the line at or in the vicinity of the White House. Members having automobiles, I understand, will receive automobile cards, which will admit them into the grounds. In a general way, I understand, that is to be the program.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are indebted to the gentleman for that statement.

Mr. TREADWAY. Speaking of a place to park automobiles in the vicinity of the State, War, and Navy Building, will there be any reservation so that Members can do that? It is very difficult to find a parking place anywhere downtown.

Mr. MONDELL. The space that is to be reserved will be reserved for the use of the Members. Just what that space will be I am not informed at this time, but it will be in that locality, back of the State, War, and Navy Building and about the Ellipse, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The officer in charge states to the Chair that it might be well to say that the two tickets sent to Members are for themselves, and that they include their own admission, and that it will not be possible for Members to have other tickets. One ticket is for the the Member and one for any friend.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was just about to suggest that I think that statement should be made. In other words, every Member should understand that he himself will be required to have a ticket in order to be admitted.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss briefly a report appearing in the newspapers this morning, given out by the Associated Press, with regard to immigration. This report deals with statements made in the House of Commons Thursday by Mr. Harmsworth, undersecretary of foreign affairs, concerning the diplomatic protests of that great Government against the rejection by the United States of immigrants from that nation and our refusal to admit certain of them. The report mentions the case of a man named Mark Glanvill, a South African, who undertook to return to the United States in order to resume his studies at a Young Men's Christian Association school in Massachusetts.

When he was detained at Ellis Island for the purpose of being put through the ordinary examination that all immigrants are subjected to even if admissible, he protested, stood on his rights as a British subject, refused to be examined, and asked to be deported. Thereupon the proceedings on the part of the United States ceased, but the suggestion was made that if this man did not want to undertake the examination that we require of all he might go to Canada, a sister nation to the South African Republic; and Mr. Glanvill thereupon undertook to go to Canada, I am told, and Canada rejected him. Great Britain protested to our State Department some time ago, and has made numerous other protests. I have not heard, however, that Britain protests against the rejection of certain of her subjects by Canada. Part of Glanvill's complaint was that he was kept under restraint on the ship that took him back. It was a British ship, so that is not our affair. Glanvill's failure to be readmitted to the United States was the result of his own bullheadedness. Newspapers and churches which are taking up his case should know the facts.

Now, these are being made matters of diplomatic protest and report, and discussion in the British House of Commons, and therefore I think we in the House of Representatives are justified in discussing these and other cases here. We have a right also to reaffirm our protests against the actions of various Governments who are undertaking to unload their weary, worn, and poverty-stricken citizens upon us in spite of our restrictive laws.

Another British case is that of a one-armed soldier, probably a good soldier, who after the war committed an embezzlement in England and fled to the United States, and by some subterfuge was about to be admitted in spite of his embezzlement until it turned out on examination that he had picked up on the boat a French woman and was guilty of concubinage, which is a cause for deportation. They were about to refuse to admit him for that offense, when it turned out that he had gone still further and married the woman and thus committed bigamy, for, after the embezzlement, he deserted a wife and children in England. His case, I understand, is charged up as one more United States immigration outrage, although it may not have yet become a matter of diplomatic exchange.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; briefly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman is referring to cases which the Government took up with the State Department?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and I am taking a few of them from our standpoint and for our benefit.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I simply wanted to understand whether the British Government had made representations or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I believe the British Government has made formal representations in quite a number of cases. I am making a few representations to my fellow Members of the House.

Next, I want to call attention to the fact that the New York Times announces in a heading to-day that the immigration policy is to be or has been changed, and in spite of the 3 per cent regulations the authorities have received a new order to the effect that the last immigrants may remain at Ellis Island to come in under the next quota, and that that applies particularly to the Greek Government. The Times makes the statement on the authority of a prominent New York lawyer. I would like to say that is not quite the case that the law has been changed or the rules modified.

The only ones sent over into the next month's quota, except a few thousand that came in the first month and were sent over under the authorization of a resolution of Congress, have been cases permissible under the law—individual cases where it was inadvisable to return them, owing to excessive hardship. These have been admitted since July 1 to the total number of only 843.

I think it is necessary to make these statements because every time the Associated Press or one of these great dailies prints a report of that kind it goes all through the country and increases the disturbance by making people believe that individuals can come in in spite of the restrictive laws.

While on this general subject I want to call attention of Members to the fact that since there has been such a hue and cry that our temporary restriction law divides families, and since it has been shown that every time one member of a family gets in he immediately goes to work and helps raise the hue and cry and wants the other members of the family to come in, and that the Bureau of Immigration, instead of weakening, has tightened up, and now will not split families at all if it can be helped.

One thing more that the public ought to know about, and that is that the congested ports in the European districts one year ago are still just as congested as they were then. The congestion at Constantinople has increased, and the great cantonment at Paris erected on money contributed by charitably inclined people for the refugees of Poland is still running full blast. Every effort is being made in Paris to assist them on their way to the United States and to prevent their remaining in France.

Money is sent from this country to assist them. It will come as a matter of some surprise to these good people who contributed the money to know that Shapiro, the agent over there of one of these great charitable societies, has been caught red-handed taking tribute from the steamship companies. These companies always collect, even in the case of poor refugees, all that the traffic will bear. When this scoundrel Shapiro was caught with the goods on him, taking money from charity with one hand and rebates from the steamship companies with the other, the prefecture of the Paris police called upon him to disgorge and made him lay on the table in one day two or three hundred thousand francs of that ill-gotten money.

I mention this to show the fraud that is going on. Fraudulent sales of passports and visés that are still being made by certain people, preying on their own people.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask that the gentleman from Washington have all the time that he desires.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Five minutes will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In addition to that sort of fraud, it will interest some to know that aliens from this country and other centralized European countries are engaged principally in Austria and other broken-down countries in buying from those destitute and stricken people their precious jewels at the very minimum price, and that these jewels are being smuggled into this country every single day of the year in large numbers. Sailors come in carrying hidden jewels and precious stones obtained from these starving people in these war-wrecked countries.

Their own people, as I said, are filling the ports trying to get here. Their Governments try to help them. The United States is the goal. It is a sad situation. I think one of the worst places now is Constantinople. Some people from the United States who went over there this year, and who until they went there never believed in any restriction policy for the United States, are now writing to me as chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization to the effect that they have changed their minds and that the quicker the United States can shut out still more aliens the better off the United States will be. They have sent me reels of moving pictures showing the conditions in Constantinople, picturing distress to the extreme. They have sent me also pictures from Danzig showing the cleaning-up efforts there. There is an organized effort by all societies and associations to clean up and take care of those refugees. I have also pictures of a new industry there, known as the "nitting industry," showing rows of women engaged in picking the nits out of each other's hair.

We are having protests from many countries. But I have not found that any of these countries are protesting against the Canadian immigration laws, which are identical with ours up to the emergency act which we passed this year. The general immigration act of Canada is as nearly like ours as one can be in another country. It is modeled on ours, but before we passed the 3 per cent restriction they passed an order in council requiring every immigrant to have in his pocket $250, with certain exemptions for families. They are adhering to that, and are turning back great numbers at Canadian ports, while at our ports, in spite of the restrictions, the congestion and trouble at Ellis Island comes largely from the fact that nine-tenths of all who arrive here nowadays have less than $5 each in their pockets, in spite of the fact that we are supposed to require those who come here to show some likelihood that they will be able to sustain themselves at least until they reach their final port or the home of their relatives. The fact that they are coming to us with no money whatever except very small amounts forces their detention at Ellis Island, congests that place, and is one cause of the sensational stories you read in the newspapers every day, particularly in the newspapers which are anxious to break down all of the laws that the United States has that would restrict immigration.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up further time, except to say that very early in the winter session I hope we can act on a bill by which the United States will make its examinations—medical, physical, and otherwise—in the ports of all foreign countries which will permit us to do so, and I think those countries which are desirous of sending some immigrants to this country will permit that. If the countries stand on their treaty rights and decline to permit it, we will have to still let them come to Ellis Island, there to be examined, where I hope the examination will be much more rigid than it now is.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at a later date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REFERENCE OF SENATE BILL 2133.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 2133, ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico, be rereferred from the Committee on Public Lands to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I preferred this request several days ago, and at the request of the majority leader let it go over for a time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman conferred with the majority leader as to this proposal at this time?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN LIBERTY LOAN SUBSCRIBERS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 5775 for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill H. R. 5775. The previous question has been ordered on a motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Insert the word "stockholder" after the word "director," in line 24, page 2.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois) there were—ayes 22, noes 66.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr Speaker, I object to the vote, and make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 183, answered "present" 1, not voting 181, as follows:

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote of "aye" and announce a pair. I am paired with the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE], who would vote "no" and I would vote "aye."

The name of Mr. TINKHAM was called, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present; the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. No; I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker, at the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota demands the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill. Eighteen gentlemen have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio; Robbinsdale State Bank, Robbinsdale, Minn.; and Farmers & Merchants State Bank, Kenmare, N. Dak."

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. By special order to-day bills on the Private Calendar to which no objection is made are in order.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the first bill.

LUKE RATIGAN.

The first bill in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2614) for the relief of Luke Ratigan.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DELAWARE RIVER LIGHTERING CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2049) for the relief of the Delaware River Lightering Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the Treasury of the United States, from funds not otherwise appropriated, $1,960, under such conditions as the Secretary of the Navy may direct, to the Delaware River Lightering Co., of the city of Philadelphia, State of Pennsylvania, in full payment for damages done when the Navy tug Carl R. Gray collided with and damaged the barge Ruth, owned and operated by the said Delaware River Lightering Co.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DR. O. H. TITTMAN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6245) for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LLOYD E. GANDY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2861) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

W. R. GRACE & CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1733) for the relief of W. R. Grace & Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. R. Grace & Co., of 7 Hanover Square, New York City, the sum of $263.73, the amount which said W. R. Grace & Co. paid as customs duty on 180 bales of caraway seed, which was imported on May 15, 1918, the entry on which was liquidated on August 10, 1918, and which was reported for exportation by the Department of Agriculture on November 13, 1918, after the expiration of the 30-day period provided by law for the filing of protests after liquidation of entry.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If a bill is objected to upon this call, this being a special order for the day, does not the bill still retain its place upon this calendar without any further order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

WILLIAM GORDON CORPORATION.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1460) for the relief of the William Gordon Corporation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I rise to obtain information from the chairman of the committee who reported this bill. I notice that the committee did not follow the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, who stated that in his opinion the amount that should be paid to the William Gordon Corporation should be left to his discretion. I believe, after reading the report and the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the William Gordon Corporation is entitled to compensation for the heating they were required to make of the new Interior Department building occasioned by the extension of the contract for its construction, but I am not willing to have the bill go to the extent it does in opposition to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman would be willing to adopt a substitute to conform to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury substantially as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the William Gordon Corporation such sum, not exceeding $8,000, as he may determine will compensate the said corporation for furnishing of temporary heat in the Interior Department building as the result of the extension of time on their contract.

I do not know whether it was the intention of the committee not to follow the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury or not, but the bill which was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion is the identical bill now up for consideration, and the committee has not made any recommendation so far as amendment of it is concerned.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman who introduced the bill is not here. Does not the gentleman think that suggestion ought to be made when he is here?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, the fact is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, is also from the great City of Brotherly Love and may be better acquainted with the facts in this case than the gentleman who introduced the bill. Of course, I do not wish to take advantage of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who introduced the bill, because of his absence.

If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, says this bill ought to go over because of the absence of the author of the bill, I will most gladly yield to that suggestion.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, answering the gentleman's inquiry, I will say the committee intended to carry out the instructions of the Secretary and put in the bill the words:

Or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the attention of the chairman to the position I have taken. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury states that he is in receipt of a report on H. R. 1460, and the bill under consideration is H. R. 1460. In the latter part of the report the Secretary says:

While, therefore, recognizing the justice of the claim for relief on the part of the William Gordon Corporation, it is recommended that the bill be so changed as to provide for the payment to the contractors by the Secretary of the Treasury such additional amount as he may determine they have expended in the furnishing of temporary heat as the result of the extension of time on their contract, provided that said amount shall not exceed $8,000.

The department does not wish to express an opinion as to whether only the actual expenses connected with furnishing the heat should be allowed the claimant, or that the overhead charges and profits should be included, and would therefore prefer that Congress include in the legislation a direction as to what shall determine the amount to be allowed. However, $8,000 will be sufficient to settle the claim on either basis.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will add "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," which I intended to offer, I will accept his amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman think it will have the full approval of the author of the bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, I think so.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to inserting the phrase as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question about his proposed substitute. The Secretary of the Treasury in his letter to the chairman of the committee states that it was for Congress to determine whether or not in fixing the amount of this compensation it should include profits or overhead expenses. Now, in the amendment that the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes to offer as a substitute, has he drawn the language in such a way that it will only cover the actual expenses, or would it be proper to allow the inclusion of profits? The Secretary really suggests that Congress express its opinion on that phase of the matter.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think you will find the intention of the committee was not to include profits and expenses, but to give sufficient money to cover all the damage that was sustained by extension of the contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. Answering the inquiry propounded by the gentleman from Texas, as I understand the situation there was an extension of the time of the general contractor in the building of the new Interior Department Building to a certain date, April 1. The William Gordon Corporation had a contract to install the elevators in that building and also to heat the building during the construction, I assume, of the building. The William Gordon Corporation, after the privilege was extended to the original contractor——

Mr. BLACK. I understand all the facts in the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am explaining them to the rest of the committee, who may not have that information. After the original contract had been extended, this claimant also applied for an extension of time to complete their contract. That was granted. Now, I only think they are entitled from the Secretary of the Treasury for compensation for the heating of the building up to that time, and not for any damages that they may have suffered by reason of the extension of the construction of the building for the reason that they themselves asked to have the right to have their contract extended also.

Mr. BLACK. The point I make is that the Secretary suggests that this claim, when filed with the department, may include not only the actual expenses but provide for the transaction, and then he suggests it is a matter for Congress to determine.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I can answer the gentleman very easily. We have the bill before the committee. It amounted to $9,704.20. Included in that was $802 overhead and $882 profit. We deducted those sums and gave an award of $8,000.

Mr. BLACK. With that explanation I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, when the Treasury Department comes to audit this claim, as they are required to do, practically, by this bill, they may conclude that less than $8,000 is due, even excluding overhead charges and profit. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether he would not add a proviso like this, namely: "Provided, That no overhead charges or profit shall be included in the payment to said company"?

Mr. STAFFORD. Personally I have no objection to it, but as the substitute prepared by me leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and limits the amount to not exceeding $8,000 and authorizes him to pay the William Gordon Corporation such sum as he may determine as will compensate the corporation for furnishing temporary heat, I do not think there is any great need of the provision suggested by the gentleman. But yet I have no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. With the statement of the chairman of the committee that it is the intention of the committee that no overhead charges and profit shall be paid, and in the light of this discussion, I have no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury will confine the payment to actual cost.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1460) for the relief of the William Gordon Corporation.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the William Gordon Corporation, of Philadelphia, Pa., the sum of $8,000, or so much thereof as may be deemed necessary, to fully compensate the said William Gordon Corporation for the installation of the mechanical equipment of the Interior Department Office Building and for furnishing of temporary heat as a result of the extension of time on their contract.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the William Gordon Corporation such sum, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding $8,000, as he may determine will compensate the said corporation for furnishing temporary heat to the Interior Department Office Building as the result of the extension of the time of their contract."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GEORGE VAN DERBURGH BROWN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3057) for the relief of George Van Derburgh Brown.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think this bill is too important to be considered under unanimous consent, inasmuch as it involves a principle that has not been heretofore generally recognized by the Government. Therefore I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

STEVENS INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY, HOBOKEN, N. J.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 52) for the relief of the Stevens Institute of Technology, of Hoboken, N. J.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this bill belongs in the same category as the preceding one, being a very important bill where the principle involved has not been generally recognized. I therefore object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY CO. ET AL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6250) for the relief of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co.; the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co.; and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1283, No. 117 on the Private Calendar, be substituted for this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 1283 be considered in lieu of the House bill 6250. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding, the Court of Claims is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., in accordance with the decisions of said court in causes numbered 28272, 29636, and 30159, and the claims of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co., in accordance with the decision of said court in cause No. 29875, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the claim of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co., in accordance with the decision of said court in cause No. 24409: Provided, That said court in rendering judgment shall enforce the provisions of section 3477, Revised Statutes of the United States, prohibiting the assignment of claims against the United States, and shall render judgment for said claimants only for the amounts in which they, and not any predecessors of theirs, were underpaid, it being the purpose of this act to waive only the statute of limitations and not any other legal defense the United States may have to said claims: Provided further, That the same right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as exists in other cases in the general jurisdiction of said court is hereby granted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House bill of the same purport be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the House bill of similar purport be laid on the table. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

RELIEF OF OWNERS OF THE BRITISH STEAMSHIP "CLEARPOOL."

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6628) for the relief of the owners of the British steamship Clearpool.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is the amount involved?

Mr. EDMONDS. The department in the report to the committee did not give any amount. We have no paper giving any amount at all.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Have you had any investigation as to the approximate amount?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; simply to allow them to go to court. The question would be whether the Government had any claim against the steamship company, or whether the steamship company had any claim against the Government.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I understand; but ordinarily it would be desirable to know the amount involved.

Mr. EDMONDS. I may have a memorandum of it among my papers. We might pass the bill over for the present.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I have no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I will reserve it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There have been passed here to-day already two or three bills of substantially the same character as this bill. This bill merely authorizes the hearing of this claim in a United States district court acting as in admiralty proceedings. The rule of practice in the court of admiralty is to determine, as I understand it, which party is negligent, and that party which is more grossly negligent will pay the damages awarded.

This is a case where the navigating officers may have been guilty of some negligence in operation. This does not impose on the Government necessarily any liability. If there is negligence on the part of the claimant or if there is negligence on the part of the navigating officers of the Government vessel that caused the injury, the gentleman will agree that it should be determined by a court.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wisconsin has just objected to two bills coming up under unanimous consent because of their importance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This is an important bill, involving quite a lot of money.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; no one knows how much is involved. We are referring it to a court to determine.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will remember that this bill has been objected to heretofore on several occasions.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not recall that. I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. BLANTON. That is true.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EDWARD J. SCHAEFER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1723) authorizing the payment of compensation to Edward J. Schaefer for the death of Ruth Stone Schaefer through an unlawful shot fired by a soldier in the service of the United States at Camp Alexander, Va.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will reserve it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think if bills are to be objected to, with the calendar as long as it is, we should not take up the time of the House in discussing them.

Mr. MacGREGOR. The objections of some gentleman may be captious, and, perhaps, after they have been eliminated they may withdraw their objections.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin is certain that he will object to this bill. The gentleman intends to object?

Mr. STAFFORD. Unless I am convinced that the principle involved here is a meritorious one I shall object.

Mr. MONDELL. The report in the case indicates the principle. It is a principle involved in half a dozen of these cases, all of which some gentlemen are objecting to. At some other time we may discuss that principle, but I do not think we can do it to-day when we are trying to pass bills that are not objected to.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Does the gentleman from Wyoming indicate that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is going to object to a bill which provides compensation for the murder of one of my constituents?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming is not the custodian of the conscience of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield further when the gentleman puts me in that light. Certainly the gentleman from New York goes pretty far and shows that he is not acquainted with the bill when he charges me with anything like that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman means only to murder the bill and not the constituent. [Laughter.]

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EPHRAIM LEDERER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5249) for the relief of Ephraim Lederer, collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as to $1,000 of this amount of $1,900 proposed to be credited to the collector of internal revenue there can be no criticism, but as to the remaining $900 I do not know whether a sufficient showing has been made that the collector was exercising the care and attention that he should exercise in the performance of his duty when these 100 sheets of cigar stamps were taken from his stock of stamps in his office.

Mr. EDMONDS. They were not taken from his stock of stamps, but they disappeared in moving from one building to the other.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the gentleman is mistaken as to that. That statement applies to the $1,000 claim, to which I said there could be no objection.

Mr. EDMONDS. That refers to the other stamps.

Mr. STAFFORD. There can be no objection to the $1,000 item, but as to the $900 item the collector of internal revenue for the eastern district of Pennsylvania received a certain consignment of stamps, and on the second day after he received them they disappeared; but where is there anything in the report to show that he exercised reasonable care in trying to conserve the property of the Government over which he was special custodian?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have here an affidavit prepared by the collector in connection with this case. In connection with the $900 loss he says:

The shortage in question was ascertained on the day when it apparently occurred, to wit, November 7, 1919, on the daily balancing of accounts in the cashier's office by Stamp Deputy John J. Gegan. The said John J. Gegan has been employed in the Internal Revenue Office since 1895, and has been in charge of the Stamp Department for about 22 years; that on balancing the accounts on the said date it was ascertained that the said shortage was apparent. A thorough count and check up was made in the Stamp Division, and on the following day Deputy Collector John J. Hogan, who was then attached to the cashier's office, and who had been a division deputy, and was familiar with the checking up of cigar factories, went to all of the factories which had purchased layers of "class C" stamps on November 7, and found their stamp account to be absolutely correct. The matter was then reported to the deponent, and he instructed the accounting section of the cashier's office to make every possible investigation, so as to ascertain the exact status of the stamp accounts, and to report to deponent. This investigation was carried on over a considerable period of time, and reported to Assistant Supervisor W. C. Hobson when he came to this office several months later; and in pursuance with his suggestion, Stamp Deputy W. F. Austin, of Lancaster, Pa., was brought to the office for the purpose of checking up the stamp account, which, on completion of his checking, still showed a shortage of stamps to the value of $900, as aforesaid. The matter was further called to the attention of the examiner of accounts, J. N. Shawhan, when he came to this office in the latter part of May, 1920. Mr. Shawhan made a thorough count of the stamps and an investigation of the stamp account, and found the same condition as has been above referred to. Stamp Deputy Gegan informed the deponent at the time the shortage was first reported (on or about Nov. 9, 1919), that the class C stamps contained in a package which was sealed on November 7, 1919, was receipted for sealed, and therefore this office had no knowledge at the time the receipt was given as to whether or not said receipt was correct, it being the practice to send the receipts for the sealed packages according to the quantities designated in the accompanying forms sent from the office of the honorable Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The collector told me personally—I do not remember whether it is in the affidavit or not—that these stamps had no value until they received still further stamping from the office.

Mr. STAFFORD. I fear that by reason of the gentleman having so many of these bills called to his attention he is thinking of the item of $1,000, to which no objection can be made; because as to those stamps they could not be used without further signatures, but as to the 100 sheets of class C stamps they could be used. At least there is nothing in the report to show to the contrary.

I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether this deputy collector, Mr. Gegan, continued in the employ of the Government for some time afterwards, showing that he was a trustworthy official and that no reflection can be placed on those connected with the office?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; Mr. Gegan is still employed, or was still employed up to the time of the change in administration. I do not know whether he is there now or not. The affidavit of Mr. Lederer, the collector, says:

Deponent further says that John J. Gegan has been an exceedingly faithful and capable officer and that his record in all respects has been clean and clear, not only during the term of deponent as collector but during the term of all preceding collectors under whom he served.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of Ephraim Lederer, collector of internal revenue for the first district of Pennsylvania, by reason of shortage of 100 sheets of class C cigar stamps, each set consisting of 20 stamps, each of said stamps being worth 45 cents, a total of $900. Also for the loss of a book of wholesale liquor dealers' special tax stamps, consisting of 10 stamps, each of the value of $100, and totaling $1,000.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OWNER OF THE VESSEL MARIA ARTAU.

The next business on the private calendar was the bill (H. R. 5965) for the relief of the owner of the vessel Maria Artau.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,901.35 to the owner of the vessel Maria Artau as compensation for and in full satisfaction of all claims of such owner for any damages to said vessel sustained as a result of a collision between said vessel and the U. S. S. Kittery on August 7, 1917, in Santo Domingo waters, the responsibility for such collision having been placed on the U. S. S. Kittery by a naval board after investigation.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OLD DOMINION PIER A.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 369) for the relief of the owner of Old Dominion Pier A.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCARTHUR). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think anyone who will read the report will come to the conclusion that the claimant ought to be reimbursed in the amount of $500. I do not see, where the Navy officials say that the claimant has a just claim for $500, that we should not compensate the claimant but refer it to the Court of Claims, causing trouble to the Navy officials to present the testimony and putting more work upon the already overburdened Court of Claims. I would like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether he does not think it advisable to authorize a direct appropriation of $500 to the owner of this pier. There is in the report of Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt the following language:

There was no damage to the U. S. S. West Corum as a result of this collision. Chief Carpenter J. P. Van Sant, United States Navy machine shop, Lamberts Point, Va., examined the pier and reported the damage to be as follows: "For the most part members of the dock have been displaced, very few having been broken, necessitating the use of a derrick to replace and realign them. One piece of timber, 12 by 12 inches and about 20 inches long, was broken; the cost of repairing this damage, in dollars and cents, is estimated at approximately $500.

Then down below in the opinion we find this statement:

The cost of repairing the damage to Old Dominion Pier A will be, according to the estimate made by Chief Carpenter J. P. Van Sant, approximately $500, and it is recommended that reparation be made to the Old Dominion Land Co., of Newport News, Va., for that amount.

So I think the statement in the letter of Assistant Secretary Roosevelt that the claim is $5,000 is a typographical error.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice until we can ascertain the truth.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman is withholding consideration of the matter for the purpose of determining whether the amendment ought to be agreed to, I want to say that I do not object to the bill, but I shall object to any amendment which proposes to change a bill referring a matter to the Court of Claims to a bill with a direct appropriation. That is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know whether the gentleman has read the report, but he is fully within his rights in objecting. I think if he had read the report, having very likely heard my statement as to the recommendation of the board investigating this case, he would come to the conclusion that there is a valid claim against the Government. Then what is the use, where the board of inquiry admits that they have a claim, to refer it to the Court of Claims and take up the time of the Navy Department in presenting testimony, and take up the time of the already overburdened Court of Claims in considering it?

Mr. EDMONDS. I am going to ask unanimous consent that this be passed without prejudice.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Further reserving the right to object, I want to say that I have no objection to the bill, but I want to answer the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin. If a bill is brought in by the Committee on Claims to pay this directly, I do not think I should object, but I do not think it is a proper practice for the House to take bills reported favorably by the Committee on Claims submitting a claim to the Court of Claims and then accept an amendment to pay the claim directly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not if it is for no more than 25 cents?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not care what the amount is. It will not take the Committee on Claims long to change the bill to make a direct payment.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is very probable that we can find out very soon the proper amount, and if it is a small sum we can report a bill to pay it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

RELIEF OF THE EMPLOYEES OF THE BUREAU OF LIGHTHOUSES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3249) for the relief of certain employees of the Bureau of Lighthouses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following employees of the Bureau of Lighthouses, Department of Commerce, stationed at Bolivar Point Lighthouse, Tex., the several sums appropriated herein, the same being in full payment for the losses suffered by the said employees by loss of personal property needed at the station for lighthouse purposes or reasonably necessary in connection with official duties, namely:

To Mrs. H. C. Claiborne, widow of H. C. Claiborne, keeper, for losses in the storm of September 8, 1900, $503.98; for losses in the storm of August 16, 1915, $903.

To J. P. Brooks, first assistant keeper, for losses in the storm of August 16, 1915, $306.20.

To C. T. Morris, second assistant keeper, for losses in the storm of August 16, 1915, $61.50.

In all, $1,774.68.

And the said sum is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes of this act.

The following committee amendments were read:

On page 14, strike out the figures "$503.98" and insert in lieu thereof "$234.48."

In line 15, strike out the figures "$903" and insert in lieu thereof "$191.50."

In line 2, page 2, strike out the figures "$306.20" and insert in lieu thereof "$125.87."

In line 4, page 4, strike out the figures "$61.50" and insert in lieu thereof "$47.50."

In line 5, strike out the figures "$1,774.68" and insert in lieu thereof "$599.35."

Strike out lines 6, 7, and 8 on page 2.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FRED H. GALLUP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6966) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint Fred H. Gallup major of Field Artillery in the United States Army.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

FRANK M. STEWART.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6323) for the relief of Frank M. Stewart.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That homestead entry 04809, independence series, made by Frank M. Stewart for the southwest quarter of section 14, township 32 south, range 37 east, Mount Diablo meridian, California, be, and the same is hereby, validated, notwithstanding the fact that before making the said entry he had perfected a former entry for 160 acres in Oregon.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "homestead," strike out the word "entry" and insert the word "application."

Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "independence" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Independence."

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "entry" and insert the word "application."

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Oregon," insert: "Provided, That the application thus validated and patent issuing thereon shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the oil, gas, and other minerals in the lands so entered and patented and with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BARBOUR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TORAHACHI URATAKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1077) to authorize the payment of $5,000 to the Government of Japan for the benefit of the family of Torahachi Uratake, a Japanese subject, killed at Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, on November 25, 1915.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROBERT G. WHITFIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7483) for the relief of Robert G. Whitfield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Robert G. Whitfield, his heirs, assigns, or legal representatives, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $261.60 as a refund of a donation which Robert G. Whitfield made to the Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

TATSUJI SAITO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1078) to authorize the payment of $2,000 to the Government of Japan for the benefit of the family of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject, killed at Camp Geronimo, Mexico, May 25, 1916.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims how it is that they arrive at the payment of $5,000 in the case of Torahachi Uratake, the Japanese killed at Schofield Barracks, and arrive at only the sum of $2,000, fee and damage, in the case of Tatsuji Saito, a Japanese subject killed at Camp Geronimo, Mexico, while engaged in bootlegging among our soldiers there. These are both subjects of another nation, and if we are liable at all, we ought to be as liable for one as for the other, and the compensation should be the same, it seems to me, even though one was killed while bootlegging in Mexico.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Claims Committee is not subject to any such criticism, because this is reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So that the matter of the relative value of Japanese laborers killed is not the concern of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Committee on Claims is always consistent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, it is worth while to call attention to these bills. They come up in an official way from the State Department, and, inasmuch as they have been reported, they should be supported on the floor by members of the Foreign Relations Committee. Our Government is liable, and I presume Congress has no recourse but to make some sort of payment. I can not see why one, even though a bootlegger, should not be compensated for as much as the other. The report does not say what was the occupation of the other one.

I am led to call attention to these two bills from the fact that many people are now asking that in the preparation of the new immigration measure a clause be inserted to the effect that any naturalized citizen convicted of crime shall thereafter have his citizenship revoked unless pardoned of the crime by the judge. This suggestion has been made to the committee and hearings have been asked upon it by a distinguished Federal judge. Merely in passing as we go along in settling these claims for aliens killed in the territory of the United States or in territory under the jurisdiction of the United States Army, it might be well to observe that if we pass a law revoking the citizenship of those naturalized citizens convicted of crime, we are likely to have all kinds of these settlements to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not think the gentleman should object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects, and that ends it.

J. W. LA BARE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4845) for the relief of J. W. La Bare.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BENJAMIN R. BUFFINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3425) for the relief of Benjamin R. Buffington.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

I. C. JOHNSON, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7870) for the relief of I. C. Johnson, jr.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, this bill and the bill which follows, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, for the relief of Richard T. McCullough, are identical bills. They have been favorably reported to this House by four successive Naval Affairs Committees in different Congresses. In the Sixty-third Congress the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Witherspoon, made the report; in the Sixty-fourth Congress my late colleague, Gen. Estopinal, made the report; in the Sixty-fifth Congress the bill was not reported, as that was the war Congress and the committee was otherwise engaged; in the Sixty-sixth Congress, when another political party took charge of matters here, the bill was likewise reported, this time by Mr. PETERS, of Maine, who has recently been named a Federal judge by President Harding, I understand; and in this present Congress the bill is reported by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS]. Never up to this time has either of these bills had the opportunity of being considered on its merits on the floor. The only way these bills have ever been reached was under a unanimous-consent agreement like the present one. Heretofore some gentleman has always interposed an objection and has prevented even a consideration and an explanation of the measures. I had hoped that to-day there would not be this objection made, so that we could consider these two bills, identical in character, on their merits, and then, if after discussion and explanation the House does not see fit to restore to these gentlemen their lost numbers, which is the object of the bills, the House can refuse to pass the bills, but in that event the gentlemen will have been afforded an opportunity to have their cases presented to the Congress.

Under these circumstances I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say for the benefit of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the action that is sought here will not cost the Treasury of the United States a single penny more than is charged against it at this time. It is merely a matter of relative rating of these two officers. A number of officers in the service bear the same rank, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the report shows that these two officers were accorded the same treatment as to loss of numbers as has been extended in many, many instances. It is a case of favoritism by legislative action to some special few. If the Committee on Naval Affairs wishes to bring in a bill repealing the law so as to accord all equally, that is one thing; but here just merely to single out persons who in the actual administration of the law failed in their examinations and were demoted as a consequence, and then years afterwards they come here by special bill and ask to have them reinstated——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will yield in order to allow me to correct his erroneous impression.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will, but not at present. Years afterwards they come here and, after having failed in examination, get reinstated to the position in rank as though they had not failed just because, perhaps, they have good records. That is, I think, a practice that is not to be commended.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if he has read the report and the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the subject, he will find that those two gentlemen—there are no other cases like it—those two gentlemen were the first cases in which the Navy Department decided to apply strictly the provisions of the Revised Statutes which levied the penalty of the loss of a year in numbers where officers failed on the examinations for promotion to an upper grade. Previous to that, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will look at the report, he will see it was the practice of the examining boards, on their own initiative, when failure by a small margin was disclosed, as in this case, to give an opportunity to take a further examination before making final report to the Navy. The Navy came to the conclusion that it was an undesirable practice and in the case of these two men for the first time applied strictly the provisions of the Revised Statutes. Subsequently it is shown that the boards in similar cases now, instead of making their report that the man has failed in one particular, give him additional questions and give him another opportunity, or rather, added opportunity, instead of depriving him of this great loss of numbers. Furthermore, Congress saw that was a great hardship, because in 1912 an amendment was passed to the section of the Revised Statutes which imposed the loss of a whole year, reducing the penalty to six months for failure to pass the first examination.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, permit me this additional suggestion to both of the gentlemen, that in these two cases the examinations were actually held and the papers graded under the old policy——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Exactly.

Mr. KRAUS. And when the papers reached the department the new policy had been adopted. As a matter of fact, it seems to me it is a real injustice to those men.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire how many cases there are in the naval service where persons have suffered demotion because of the adoption of this new rule as to loss of numbers when they failed to meet the examination requirement in examination for promotion?

Mr. KRAUS. The subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs had information from the department on that subject, and under this provision of law and this modified policy there are just two known cases, and they are both before the House at this time, or will be, for its consideration.

Mr. DUPRÉ. There have been no laches or delay. The gentleman from Wisconsin spoke of these cases coming up years afterwards. The examination of these officers was held in 1909. I came to Congress in 1911, and I have been trying to get this relief from the House ever since, so there has been no delay on the part of the claimant, who is a Louisianian and an old and close friend of mine, and no want of diligence or effort on the part of this Congressman in the premises.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I am not impervious to change after I have taken a position on reading of these reports. I gained the impression there have been many who had been treated the same way as Lieut. Commander Johnson. I do not believe we should single out so long afterwards him or anybody else for preferential consideration by legislative enactment. If, however, as the gentleman from Louisiana and the gentleman from Indiana say, these are the only two instances where persons have suffered as the result of this new rule, I will withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to restore Commander Isaac C. Johnson, jr., United States Navy, to a place in the list of commanders in the United States Navy, to rank next after Commander Walter A. Smead, United States Navy.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DUPRÉ, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RICHARD P. M'CULLOUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2558) for the relief of Richard P. McCullough.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Commander Richard P. McCullough, United States Navy, to a place on the list of commanders of the Navy, to rank next after Commander Walter Albert Smead, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KRAUS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ELLEN M. WILLEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5659) for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, widow of Owen S. Willey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I notice that in the letter of Secretary Denby, of date June 30, printed on page 3 of the report, he refers to a letter to the committee, dated May 19, 1921, in which the department disapproved of the relief sought by this bill. I do not find that letter in the report. Can the committee, or some Member of the House, acquaint the House with the contents of it?

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, I thought that letter was a part of the report. But the facts of the case are these:

The Navy Department had consistently, during the administration of Secretary Daniels, opposed the passage of this bill, but the facts of the case are as follows: This man, Owen Willey, during the Civil War was a mate on the Pocahontas, operating in Mobile Bay. At that time there was another man, whose name was J. H. Wiley, who held the same rank on the same ship. Commander Gamble was in command of the Pocahontas and had recommended Owen Willey for promotion to the rank of ensign. He had about the same time preferred charges against J. H. Wiley on this same ship, and a court-martial was pending against him. Before action was taken on the commander's recommendation for promotion of Owen Willey and before the court-martial was had on J. H. Wiley the man named in this bill, Owen Willey, was allowed to go home on a furlough. While home on a furlough Mr. Willey received a notice that he had been dishonorably dismissed from the Navy. The promotion that was recommended for him before he left the ship was given to J. H. Wiley, who was charged with some crime and who was about to be court-martialed. In other words, it was a mix-up of these two men in their names, notwithstanding the differences in initials and first names. This man Willey demanded a court-martial at that time, but a court-martial was denied him, and he was without remedy.

Along in 1873 or 1874 there was to be held an examination in the Revenue-Cutter Service here in Washington. About 35 or 40 young men applied to take the examination. Owen Willey, this man, had the highest grade in the examination. He went into the Revenue-Cutter Service and served with distinction for 37 years and retired with the rank of captain. At the time he made the application to take this examination Commander Gamble wrote a letter in which he excused Willey's conduct on the ground that he had made a mistake in these two men, because their names were somewhat similar, although dissimilar in fact, and that he had been wrong.

This officer is dead. His widow is an old woman, very poor and deserving, and the effect of the passage of this bill, which is a delayed act of justice to an officer who rendered faithful service as a sailor in the Civil War and in the Revenue-Cutter Service afterwards, will be to give her a pension.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman acquainted with the purport of the letter dated May 19, 1921, in which the department disapproved of the relief being sought through this bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. But that letter is based upon previous objections to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it a short letter? What is the general purport of it? It is not included in the report. I direct the gentleman's attention to the reference in the last three lines:

I have the honor to inform you that this department's attitude was fully set forth in its letter to your committee dated May 19, 1921, in which it disapproved of the relief being sought through this bill.

The committee brings in a report which does not contain that letter, and I am seeking to ascertain the viewpoint of the present Secretary of the Navy as to this bill.

Mr. KRAUS. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. KRAUS. My recollection is that it was merely a declaration of the policy of the department to oppose general legislation, and it was based on that fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman states that on good authority it may remove any objection I have to this bill.

Mr. KRAUS. This is a bill to pension the widow of a veteran of the Civil War, and so far as the final action that is taken is concerned, it is more a matter, you might say, for the Bureau of Pensions than for the Navy Department, although the latter is interested in the basic facts. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to other organizations of the Government that have passed upon this fact. The Treasury Department has passed upon it, and another bureau, which had under its jurisdiction the awarding of medals for service in the Civil War, has passed upon the facts. Both have found that Owen S. Willey had a creditable and honorable record in the service during the Civil War, and it seems to me, with these two organizations passing upon the essential facts, that we can make no mistake, but will merely be doing justice at this late date, by giving consideration to this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MCPHERSON] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KRAUS] has shown to me, at least, that there is merit in this bill, and I withdraw any reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws the late Owen S. Willey, who served in the United States Navy from July 11, 1860, to April 16, 1863, as an acting master's mate, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the naval service of the United States as an acting master's mate on April 16, 1863: Provided, That no pay, bounty, pensions, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KRAUS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CAPT. BENJAMIN S. BERRY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2556) to advance Capt. Benjamin S. Berry to the permanent rank of major.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to advance Capt. Benjamin S. Berry, United States Marine Corps, on the lineal list of officers of the Marine Corps, to take rank among the permanent majors of the Marine Corps next after Lauren S. Willis, United States Marine Corps: Provided, That the said Benjamin S. Berry shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, by examination pursuant to law, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of that grade: Provided further, That the said Benjamin S. Berry shall be carried as additional to the number of the grade to which he may be appointed under this act or at any time thereafter promoted: And provided further, That said Benjamin S. Berry shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to any back pay or allowances of any kind.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 2, after the word "further," strike out "That the said Benjamin S. Berry shall be carried as additional to the number of the grade to which he may be appointed under this act or at any time thereafter promoted: And provided further". And on page 2, line 7, after the word "kind," insert "And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall operate to increase the number of majors in the United States Marine Corps as now authorized by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KRAUS: Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to advance Major" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to place Major," and strike out all of the first proviso beginning with the word "Provided," on line 9, page 1, and ending with the word "grade" on page 2, line 2.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, where the amendment says on line 5 strike out the word "Major," that should be the word "Captain." I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment accordingly; to strike out the word "Captain" instead of "Major."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported with the change suggested by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the modification will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana with the suggested change be reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to advance Captain," and insert in lieu thereof "to place Captain," and strike out all of the first proviso, beginning with the word "Provided," line 9, page 1, and ending with the word "grade," page 2, line 2.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think that the purpose of the gentleman from Indiana is to insert in lieu of the language stricken out, "to place Major," instead of "to place Captain." Is that the purpose?

Mr. KRAUS. Yes; that is the purpose.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It should be "to place Captain."

Mr. STAFFORD. No. He has been advanced to the majorship since this bill was reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, that correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment again reported as it should be?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to advance Major."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk is reporting the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana in the form in which it was sent up to the desk.

Mr. STAFFORD. But since it was sent up we are trying to have it modified.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not proper to have it modified without unanimous consent.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not necessary to have unanimous consent, because we are proceeding in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire the correction to be made?

Mr. KRAUS. Yes. I so requested the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "authorized," strike out the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to advance Captain," and insert "place Major," and strike out all of the first proviso, beginning with the word "Provided," line 9, page 1, and ending with the word "grade," page 2, line 2.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is necessitated because of the fact that since this report was made the captain has been promoted on examination to a higher grade, and now the effect of the bill is merely to fix his lineal position in the promotion list.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KRAUS. Mr. Speaker, since that amendment has been adopted, I move that the word "further" be stricken out on line 2, page 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Has the committee amendment been adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. The committee amendment was adopted some time ago. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the title will be corrected to conform to the text of the bill.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. KRAUS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WIDOW AND HEIRS OF JOSEPH ETIER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7290) to confirm private land claim of the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the private land claim of the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier, No, 243, class 5, in the report dated December 30, 1815, of the register and receiver at Opelousas, La., acting as commissioners on land claims in the western district of the State of Louisiana, which has been surveyed and segregated as section 40, township 13 north, range 4 east, Louisiana meridian, containing 668 77/100 acres, shall be, and the same is hereby, confirmed, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patent to issue for said land to the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives: Provided, That this act, and the patent which may be issued in pursuance of the same, shall only operate as a relinquishment on the part of the United States, and shall in no way prejudice any valid adverse right, if such exist, to the said land; the intent being that title shall insure to the true owners of the land under the laws of Louisiana, including the laws of prescription, in the absence of any interest or estate of the United States.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "insure" and insert in lieu thereof the word "inure."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PAY DIRECTOR LIVINGSTON HUNT, UNITED STATES NAVY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3754) for the relief of Pay Director Livingston Hunt, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pay Director Livingston Hunt, United States Navy, the sum of $57.27, to reimburse him for the amount deposited in the Treasury to cover certain payments made for telephone service in officers' quarters, credit for which payments was disallowed in his accounts.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "Pay Director" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Rear Admiral."

Page 1, line 6, after the word "Hunt," insert the words "Supply Corps."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Rear Admiral Livingston Hunt, Supply Corps, United States Navy."

On motion of Mr. BURDICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HERBERT LANGLEY, UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7415) to correct and amend the service and military records of Herbert Langley, United States Marine Corps.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold my objection in order to allow the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is, to my mind, a very meritorious measure. It is recommended by the present Secretary of the Navy and its passage was recommended by the former Secretary of the Navy.

The facts are these: This young man, Herbert Langley, was a son of Dr. Langley, of Granby, Mo. He volunteered in 1917 for service in the World War in the Marine Corps. Instead of being sent to the western front, he was sent to Santo Domingo. The records of the Navy Department show that there was not a mark or blemish upon his record as a soldier. The testimony taken before us of the officers in command of the Marine Corps in Santo Domingo was that this soldier was insane. He was in a hospital for dysentery and for mental treatment. He escaped from the hospital. His escape was discovered within a short time. All the marines in the city were immediately enlisted in the search. All the police force of the city and the Santo Domingo soldiers joined in the search, which was just as thorough as it could be for more than a week, and included a thorough search all along the water front. The colonel and captain and other officers in command say that Mr. Langley was not on the island. They further say that it was absolutely impossible or practically impossible that he could have escaped from the island. He was in uniform. At the time he disappeared there was a transport standing about 3 miles out at sea. They say, however, it was practically impossible that he could have swam out to that transport, got aboard of her, and lived there for nine days without being discovered. It was nine days from the time he escaped until the transport touched another port.

In the harbor at Santo Domingo city there is a strong undertow, and a short time before this man disappeared a young lady school-teacher was bathing there with her class, and in the sight of hundreds on shore her body was seen to be sucked down. She was carried out to sea, and, although search was begun within a few minutes, her body was never found.

The Navy Department, the commandant of the Marine Corps, and the officers in charge on the island one and all are morally certain that this soldier either accidentally fell off the sea wall and was drowned and his body went to sea or that while insane he committed suicide by jumping into the water and that his body was carried out to sea and therefore never recovered. In either case his death was the result of an accident within the meaning of the law and he is not a deserter.

This occurred in February, 1919. The officers in command of the Marine Corps had no other option save to mark him a deserter. The dead soldier was an only son. The false charge of desertion on his service record has brought much pain and great humiliation to his splendid parents. The object of this bill is to erase that stain from the record of a faithful soldier who gave his life in the way I have described, for you and I and the people of this Nation. If he accidentally died he is not a deserter, but he died in the line of duty. If he committed suicide while insane, that in the meaning of the law was an accident in the line of duty, and I sincerely hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection and allow the House to direct the Navy Department to enter upon its records a true account of the disappearance of Herbert Langley.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, under the reservation of objection, I wish to say that I read this report very carefully, but failed to find some of the statements made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McPHERSON], who has just addressed the House. It is not a fact, according to the report, that he was confined in the hospital and escaped. According to the report, he was granted a furlough and did not show up after the time of the furlough. The report does not show that he was confined in the hospital because of mental disorder. It is easy enough to get up here and place a Member in a wrong light; but I do not believe the gentleman did that intentionally. Perhaps he has some information which is not contained in the report. In order to set my position right, let me read what the colonel commanding the regiment says in a letter to the father of this soldier, following the disappearance of this young man, the letter being based on the official Army record:

Pvt. Langley was at the time of his disappearance under treatment in the field hospital in this city for dysentery, being shown on the daily sick report as "doing well."

On February 24, 1919, he was granted liberty, which expired the same day, but failed to return at its expiration, and he has not since been seen, nor has any trace or information as to his movements been received.

Now, why have I objected to this bill notwithstanding the statement made by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. McPHERSON. If the gentleman will examine——

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill purposes to write into the records of the Navy Department something that is not so, something as to which there is no testimony. That has never been done in this House or in the history of the Government—to write into the record something that is not based on testimony. The bill provides that we shall write into the naval records the statement that—

Herbert Langley died on February 24, 1919, at Santo Domingo City, Dominican Republic, by accident while in the line of duty.

That is based entirely upon conjecture, and therefore I object.

Mr. McPHERSON. If you will read the testimony of the chaplain——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the letter of the chaplain.

Mr. McPHERSON. The truth, according to the testimony of all these officers that we had before the committee, was that he had escaped from the hospital and was not on a furlough. The gentleman from Wisconsin is putting up his idea of what happened to this boy against the testimony of all the officers of the Marine Corps and the Navy Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. Never in the history of the Government have we changed the naval record by legislative enactment so that it would state facts that are not so. This bill is founded upon conjecture, just as if a person going to Atlantic City and being seen in the surf is not seen afterwards is to be regarded as drowned because persons have been lost in the undertow.

Mr. McPHERSON. The gentleman must remember that this boy was down there in a hostile country, that he was in uniform, and that he has never been seen since. The testimony that convinced the officers and the Naval Committee that this man was drowned there was testimony that excluded any other theory. He was not on the island; he could not have got away; he was insane.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the record that shows he was suffering from mental trouble.

Mr. McPHERSON. There is the testimony of the physician.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the doctor's statement, read it before I came in on the floor of the House. It would be presumptuous for me to object to bills if I had not read the reports; it would not be courteous to the committee. Permit me to read the report of the surgeon:

1. This man was admitted to the field hospital, Santo Domingo City, Dominican Republic, four times in all. In November, 1917, he was in the hospital 10 days with malaria; in June, 1918, he was on the sick list 3 days with malaria; in February, 1919, he was on the sick list 5 days with dysentery.

2. After he was returned to duty from this last-mentioned condition he was again sent to the hospital and admitted with the diagnosis of neurasthenia and remained for six days, then disappeared.

3. He seemed to worry about himself and complained of many vague conditions.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does this involve any question of insurance?

Mr. McPHERSON. I think he had insurance.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Government insurance or private?

Mr. McPHERSON. War-risk insurance.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. This act of Congress may establish financial rights against insurance companies?

Mr. McPHERSON. No; the insurance he had was war-risk insurance. There has been no claim for compensation, for the parents are well to do, and this was an only child.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. How much insurance had he?

Mr. McPHERSON. Ten thousand dollars.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Payable if we pass this act?

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not think that any court on this evidence would refuse to hold that he was dead.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Has the claim been passed upon?

Mr. McPHERSON. No; there has been no effort to collect it. The passage of the bill is not necessary to collect the insurance, because a court, notwithstanding the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin, would be convinced on the testimony, which really excludes every reasonable doubt, that this man is dead.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The ordinary presumption is that the man is dead after seven years.

Mr. McPHERSON. That is a presumption without evidence. Without any evidence absence for seven years raises a presumption of death, but here the evidence shows the man is dead. We resort to presumption only in the absence of evidence. Here we have evidence that excludes every hypothesis save death, and there is no occasion to resort to presumption. He was not on the island and he could not have got away, that was disclosed by the search.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I object.

ALBERT HAMILTON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5820) to place Albert Hamilton on the retired list of the United States Marine Corps.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object.

Mr. KRAUS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if gentlemen propose to object, I do not think it is fair to have bills on the calendar discussed when the discussion is to have no effect on the bill.

Mr. KRAUS. We are going to get through the calendar in about an hour.

Mr. MONDELL. We may, but I do not think we ought to discuss bills that are going to be finally objected to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I object.

CAPT. D. H. TRIBOU.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3509) for the relief of Capt. D. H. Tribou, chaplain, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Republican leader objects to withholding objection on the ground that we must hurry along; that it is getting late in the year, with not much accomplished; we must hurry along the bills over to the Senate that can not pass them.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Wyoming did not object to discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is human nature for a man to ask to have an objection withheld until he can make a statement.

Mr. MONDELL. But it does not do any good to spend time discussing a bill that is eventually going to be objected to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, let the ax fall quickly, but do not obligate the coroner's jury to do all the murdering. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEPHENS. I asked the gentleman from Wisconsin to withhold his objection because I believe this is a very meritorious case.

The subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs spent a great deal of time in investigating these cases—this case in particular. They have had before them men who have testified as to the character of Capt. Tribou, have heard the case thoroughly, and they recommend the passage of the bill. It is for the benefit of this chaplain. He had in charge the collection of money in the sale of Liberty bonds. He was chosen to perform this duty, and while away from the Naval Home in Philadelphia, where he had the bonds in a safe locked up, some one burglarized the place, stealing the Liberty bonds. Since then this chaplain has made good the Liberty bonds. He has paid for them out of his own pocket, and I know that the members of the committee believe that he should be reimbursed for the expenditure that he has made. It was no fault of his. He was acting for the Government and also for the men in the Philadelphia home who were purchasing the bonds. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Were these coupon or registered bonds?

Mr. STEPHENS. As I understand it, they were coupon bonds.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is it known whether or not any of those coupons have been cashed since the disappearance of the bonds?

Mr. STEPHENS. It has not been called to our attention.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That could be ascertained, no doubt, in the Treasury Department, and if any of those coupons have been cashed, the existence of the bonds could be identified and the bank through which they were cashed could be ascertained. By that means it could be ascertained whether or not anybody had been collecting interest on these bonds, and thus it would help to determine whether or not there was a theft. If they were registered bonds, the checks issued in payment, of course, would go to the individual of registry. I assume they were coupon bonds.

Mr. STEPHENS. I assume they were, and I also assume that the loss was not all bonds, but partially cash which he had there.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Might it not be that if we should discover that coupon bonds had been cashed, that that would help throw a light on the question of whether there was a theft?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is mistaken. They were notes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. What kind of notes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

CORNELIUS DUGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1290) for the relief of Cornelius Dugan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. KRAUS. I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object. There is no merit in this bill, as I read it.

FRANK FERRIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 2004, for the relief of Frank Ferrin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Frank Ferrin shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the Untied States as a member of Company H, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. I move to amend by inserting after the word "pension," the words "bounty, pay, or other emoluments."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 7, after the word "pension," insert the words "bounty, pay, or other emolument."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, that is the customary language used in bills of this character restoring a pensionable status.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TIMBERLAKE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AARON S. LINN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 6606, for the relief of Aaron S. Linn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman who is the author of the bill give some explanation of the facts?

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I think the report shows the absolute facts in the case.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read the report, and I notice that he had deserted two different times.

Mr. VESTAL. He served a little less than four years. The facts are that he was granted a furlough for 30 days and went home. While there he was taken ill, and was unable to get back to his regiment. He was marked a deserter, but the records show that there was nothing found against him, no charges filed against him for desertion.

The same thing happened the second time, but immediately he went back and joined his company. While he was away only about a month overtime he went back and joined his company and was wounded at the Battle of Harpers Ferry, and also at the siege of Knoxville.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think there were extenuating circumstances that obviated the charge of his first desertion. What about the second?

Mr. VESTAL. There is an affidavit there in the report which seems to show—I read from the affidavit:

That he received a letter from his home in Ohio stating that his mother was very low with typhoid fever. That his captain went with him to Col. (or Gen.) Moore's headquarters and stated his case and his desire to go home to see his mother, whereupon said Moore gave applicant a pass to go home. That he went home and there remained two days and nights when he returned to Cincinnati, Ohio, supposing his regiment would come to Cincinnati to be mustered out. That he waited a long time and his regiment did not appear in Cincinnati, but was informed that his regiment had gone to Columbus, Ohio, and was there mustered out, being out before he learned the fact of such muster out.

He waited in Cincinnati a long time in uniform. The report does not show that, but that is the fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has that testimony—that he waited there in his uniform?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And intended to join his company?

Mr. VESTAL. Absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Aaron S. Linn, late of Company K, Forty-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, also known as Company K, Eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 5th day of January, 1865.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 10, after the figures "1865," insert: "Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "pension" the words "nor bounty, pay, or other emolument."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What does that do? Does it bar a pension in the past and in the future?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the purpose of all these bills removing a dishonorable discharge is to permit the soldier to have a pensionable status, but not a pensionable status except from the passage of the act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thought the rule prevailed in the Pension Committee that the bar was in the future. If a man's record was cured of desertion by the passage of an act in Congress I thought he was even then barred from securing a pension.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the very purpose of all these bills which we have been passing here beyond number is to remove the record of the dishonorable discharge so he may secure a pension from date, but we wish to put in this saving clause as to bounty, pay, and other emoluments so he may not have a claim for back pay.

The committee amendment as amended by the amendent of the gentleman from Wisconsin was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VESTAL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ELIJAH C. PUTMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 904) for the relief of Elijah C. Putnam.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Elijah C. Putnam did enlist on the 19th day of November, 1863, at Benton, Ark., and at once entered upon active service, but was not formally mustered in until January 7, 1864, being honorably discharged March 28, 1864, by reason of disbandment of his company; and

Whereas it is held that only those soldiers of the Civil War who served for a period of 90 days or more are entitled to the additional homestead right granted under section 2306, Revised Statutes; and

Whereas this right has been denied Elijah C. Putnam (see Thirty-second Land Decisions, 356), it being held that his service only extended from the date of his muster in to the date of his honorable discharge, a period of 80 days; and

Whereas the records of the War Department show that Elijah C. Putnam actually served for a period of more than 90 days after the date of his enrollment: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the service of Elijah C. Putnam honorably discharged March 28, 1864, is declared amply sufficient to entitle him or his assigns to the benefits of said section 2306, Revised Statutes, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized to recognize the same.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out the preamble, pages 1 and 2; and page 2, line 3, strike out the word "Putnam" and insert "Putman" and amend the title.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read "An act for the relief of Elijah C. Putman."

On motion of Mr. MONTOYA a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RICHARD J. EASTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1949) for the relief of Richard J. Easton.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to obtain additional information than that given in the report as to the real default of this Richard J. Easton while he was in charge of this vessel, for which he seeks reimbursement to the extent of $3,842.50.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The only additional information that can be furnished is in the personal statement of Mr. Easton himself. He claims that the subordinates were inefficient, and that when he suspected the supplies were being stolen that he employed an extra watchman at his own expense in order to prevent peculations and, if possible, ascertain why there should be an apparent shortage in the supplies. The facts are fully set out in the report of the Secretary of the Navy, which is embodied in the committee report. I happen personally to know the claimant, who has been in the naval service for a great many years. He is nearly 68 years of age, and because of this shortage the company carrying his bond has called upon him to refund the amount of the alleged shortage. Steps have been taken to sell his home, which is the only property he possesses. The matter has been brought to the attention of the company's attorney with the hope of suspending action until congressional relief could be secured for him in order to save the claimant's home.

Mr. STAFFORD. The letter of the former Secretary rather implies that he was guilty of negligence in the performance of his duty; that these peculations from the mess, or whatever they might have been, the stores, had been going on for some time.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; that is very true, but the statement of the board of investigation shows there is no direct charge that Capt. Easton in any way benefited by the alleged shortage.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; there is no charge that he was in any way implicated, no reflection upon Capt. Easton at all as to his being there, but only as to whether he was negligible in any way in looking after the administration of the ship.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman will observe that section 4 of the report states:

That a series of incompetent stewards, who were discharged when their incompetency was discovered, were primarily responsible for the actual shortage, and that the low rate of pay of stewards prior to July 1, 1916, was responsible for the inability to obtain competent stewards.

I quote further from the letter of the Secretary of the Navy:

The report of the board of investigation also shows that Master Easton, while manifesting some negligence, yet used unusual precautions to prevent any shortage of stores by hiring a watchman from his own pocket and also paid the clerk in charge of the stores extra money monthly out of his own pocket to be most zealous in his duty. The board's report further shows that wastage on board which could not be prevented occurred.

Master Easton has a long and previously clear record with this department, and in view of the fact that the surety upon the bond of Master Eaton, if called upon to make good the deficiency, would undoubtedly then proceed against the principal, Master Easton, and also in view of the fact that Master Easton has been punished by being placed on indefinite furlough without pay, it is recommended that the relief asked for in the above-mentioned bill be granted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall give the benefit of the doubt in favor of the captain in view of the straitened circumstances in which he is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to eliminate the checkage, amounting to $3,842.50, lodged against the account of Richard J. Easton, late master U. S. S. Proteus.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MILES SWIFT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7234) for the relief of Miles Swift.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the naval record of Miles Swift, who served in the United States Navy from November 12, 1861, until August 15, 1864, be corrected, and that in the administration of the pension laws he shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States: Provided, That no back pension, pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue or become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Speaker, I notice we are passing a good many bills here, and I have no objection to this bill, appropriating money to certain people because the Government was to blame. I wonder if any Member of the House can tell us how long it will be before these parties get their money. I have a claim which I took up with the Treasury Department of something like $400 overpaid as income tax. The department admits that this amount was overpaid. I followed it for about a year, and they tell me now they will pay this four hundred and some odd dollars when Congress shall appropriate about $12,000,000 to meet just such cases. I was wondering how far we were getting when we appropriate sums of $3,000 to these parties toward the actual payment of just claims? I did not want to object to this bill, and shall not, for I believe this and similar bills should be considered on their merits and not simply delayed by an objection. These are all meritorious. I have listened to them, and I think something should be done to reimburse people who have overpaid the Government where the Government admits it. I have several similar bills, but it seems impossible to reach them.

I have one bill, Mr. Speaker, that I have had up for three sessions of Congress. I have urged a favorable report on it, I have received favorable reports on it, but I have never been able to reach it on the calendar. It has passed the Senate, I think, once or twice. My good friend, the chairman of this committee, has been very nice and courteous to me; he is an able chairman and is in no way to blame for these conditions, as the objection of any Member is all that is necessary. While the Treasury Department admits they collected something like $1,000 more than they ought to have collected, and that the party ought to be reimbursed, I can not get anywhere with it. These people are writing me stating that it seems to them that the Government should be just as fair to them as the Government expects them to be to it.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I yield.

Mr. ROACH. I will state to the gentleman that I recently had a claim of $900 liability, and that the payment was ordered, and that within the last few days the payment has been made.

Mr. SEARS. I want to thank the gentleman. But I wish to say that it was only day before yesterday that I was assured by them that although mine had been up for many, many months, it could not be paid without the appropriation that I have mentioned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SWING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ELLIS B. MILLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7589) for the relief of Maj. Ellis B. Miller.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of some gentleman whether this bill is akin to those two bills that were passed earlier in the afternoon granting an advanced rank by reason of failure to qualify in examinations?

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not think it is of the same character. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], I think, can explain it to you.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I do not think this bill is exactly like the other two bills. When the examination was held he was in the Philippines. It was held before the board under the rules and regulations as they were understood at that time in the Philippines, no notice having been received of any change having been made in them. Meanwhile, before the report on the examination was announced it was reported that the rules had been changed. He was ordered to the United States and came back here and took the examination again. He passed the examination physically and mentally, but it happened that there was an unpaid tailor's bill of something like $234, which was called to the attention of the examining board. Upon that basis he did not receive promotion, although he passed the examination physically and mentally in every respect.

Mr. STAFFORD. How long had he been out of the Naval Academy when he failed to pay his tailor's bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is this a bill to pay a tailor's bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. This lieutenant was refused promotion for a year because he failed to pay a naval tailors' bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is just it, and I am afraid if we get too busy in these bills we will get into trouble with one branch of the Government. The investigation shows that the Government consists of the President, the Senate, and the Director of the Budget, and if we pass a bill such as this we are liable to have it turned down by the Director of the Budget. [Laughter.]

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman that this is not a question for the Director of the Budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then it is a proper bill for the House to pass?

Mr. SWEET. It is. And I may say in this connection that the Secretary of the Navy has approved this bill. At one time it passed the Senate but was not passed by the House. In fact, it never came before the House. It has also been unanimously recommended by the committee, and I do not see any reason why it should not pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, while I do not approve of the general policy of restoring grades or advancing naval officers after they have been denied promotion by reason of some infraction of the regulations, yet when the Secretary of the Navy states positively to the Committee on Naval Affairs that he earnestly recommends that such be done, of course I submit, and I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection being withdrawn, the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7589) for the relief of Maj. Ellis B. Miller.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, commission Ellis B. Miller as a lieutenant colonel in the United States Marine Corps, as of date of June 4, 1920: Provided, That the said Ellis B. Miller shall take rank on the lineal list of lieutenant colonels in the United States Marine Corps next after James K. Tracy, the officer who immediately preceded him on the list of first lieutenants on May 13, 1908: Provided further, That the said Ellis B. Miller shall be carried as an additional number in the grade to which he may be appointed under this act, or at any time thereafter promoted: And provided further, That the said Ellis B. Miller shall not by the passage of this act be entitled to any back pay or allowances of any kind.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

On page 1, after the words "Provided further," in line 11, strike out: "That the said Ellis B. Miller shall be carried as an additional number in the grade to which he may be appointed under this act, or at any time thereafter promoted."

And insert:

"That the said Ellis B. Miller shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy by examination, pursuant to law, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of a lieutenant colonel in the United States Marine Corps: And provided further."

And on page 2, line 9, after the word "kind," insert:

"And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall operate to increase the number of lieutenant colonels in the United States Marine Corps as now authorized by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the committee amendments are agreed to.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

J. S. CARPENTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3508) for the relief of Capt. J. S. Carpenter, Pay Corps, United States Navy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3508) for the relief of Capt. J. S. Carpenter, Pay Corps, United States Navy.

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow Capt. J. S. Carpenter, Pay Corps, United States Navy, the sums of $168.48, the same being the sum disallowed by said accounting officers in the accounts of said naval officer on account of payments made on or about November 8, 1918, through error, on forged pay receipts, of money due to the following-named men in the amounts set opposite their respective names: No. 2960, J. F. De Mille, $49.98; No. 2369, A. J. Johnson, $35.96; No. 3148, J. G. Lee, $40.94; and No. 8490, J. J. Murphy, $41.60, for which said Capt. J. S. Carpenter, Pay Corps, United States Navy, was found not to be responsible.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Strike out lines 1 and 2 on page 1 and insert:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled."

Line 6, strike out the word "Captain" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Rear Admiral."

Line 7, strike out the word "Pay" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Supply."

In line 5, on page 2, strike out the word "Captain" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Rear Admiral."

In line 6, strike out the word "Pay" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Supply."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read as follows:

A bill for the relief of Rear Admiral J. S. Carpenter, Supply Corps, United States Navy.

On motion of Mr. STEPHENS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

J. L. HOLMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 513) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to J. L. Holmes of certain land in the town of Whitefield, Okla.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire what the equities are that should prompt the Government to deed these lots which are in the Government's name to the claimant as named in this bill?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I would like to state, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that the reason for the passage of this bill is very clearly set forth from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, under date May 5, 1921. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it will be necessary to read this report beyond the statement briefly to the effect that the deed was issued through a mistake by the townsite commissioner. This is stated in the report. The Government was a preferential purchaser because there were improvements on this land. But it is stated in this report, as the gentleman will see, on the second page, the Government did not own, and never had owned, the improvements, and therefore had no preferential right to buy the land and in fact did not buy it as before stated:

It is apparent from information obtained that the United States did not purchase the lots and never paid for the improvements, and that therefore the issuance, upon the payment made by Mr. Farrel, of the deed conveying the property to the United States was a mistake.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I now recall, these lots were conveyed to the Government with some sort of a building that was constructed through the donations of the local people for the use of the Government agency.

The value of the building was something like $500, and the Government by reason of that fact took a preferential right to purchase them. I would like to inquire of the gentleman as to what the real value of these lots is to-day. Of course, if it is an insignificant question we will pass it over hurriedly.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I will say to the gentleman that the Government made no claim whatever and disavows any claim. The only necessity for this legislation is that through a mistake, as stated here, upon the payment of the purchase price, which is fixed in the law authorizing the organization of these townsites, which it is not necessary to refer to—I presume the gentleman is familiar with the act.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the value of the lot to-day?

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I could not tell you, sir. Nor is the question of value in any way involved.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon the regular order for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the bill is rather of a nonessential character, and I do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to execute, acknowledge, and deliver, in the name of the United States of America, a deed of quitclaim and release to J. L. Holmes, of Whitefield, Okla., his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest in and to lots 2 and 3, block 14, in town site of Whitefield, Okla., which was granted to the United States of America by a deed from the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to the United States of America, dated the 21st day of September, A. D. 1904, and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, said lots having been erroneously conveyed to the United States instead of E. E. Farrell, who subsequently sold and transferred same to J. L. Holmes.

With a committee amendment as follows:

On page 2, line 3, after the word "of," insert the word "to."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHITE of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the next bill.

LIEUT. COL. HENRY C. DAVIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5210) for the relief of Lieut. Col. Henry C. Davis.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

AARON KIBLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 478) for the relief of Aaron Kibler.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman who introduced this bill give to the House a brief statement of the facts that warrant its adoption?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. My colleague [Mr. FRENCH], who introduced the bill, is sick and absent from the House. In examining the bill and report, I think the real merit lies in the fact that this soldier served three years and was honorably discharged, and that he was absent without authority during his second enlistment.

Mr. STAFFORD. I now recall the bill. The testimony is that his superior officer was one of that unruly kind that made life miserable for the privates, and that the former attorney general of Iowa referred to him as being of a worthless, drunken sort. I think there may be some little basis for this soldier deserting at the close of the war after three years' service. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Aaron Kibler shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company G, Sixth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Line 7, after the word "States," insert the words "in his final service."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, to add at the end of line 10 the words "and no bounty, pay, or other emoluments shall accrue to him."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman, instead of that amendment, insert the usual amendment after the word "pension"—the words "bounty or other emoluments"? That is the usual language.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are some bills which carry the phraseology of the amendment I have just proposed. I withdraw that amendment and offer the following:

Insert after the word "pension" the words "bounty, pay, or other emoluments."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ALVAH B. DOBLE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5768) to amend and correct the military record of Alvah B. Doble.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SEARCY HOSPITAL FOR THE COLORED INSANE, ALABAMA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6961) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana demands the regular order. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Alabama should address his request to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BLAND].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana demanded the regular order and the Chair put the question, and the gentleman from Wisconsin objected.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withhold his demand and let us take up this bill.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I will withdraw it for a moment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the objection in order to ascertain from the gentleman from Alabama some information which I think the House ought to have. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether these lands are valuable or not?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; these lands lie in the bed of a stream. The State of Alabama has a very splendid institution for the care of the colored insane at Mount Vernon, Ala. It was at one time an Army hospital. The site was selected in 1830 under the direction of the President.

In 1895 Congress directed the Secretary of War to convey to the State of Alabama this reservation, which was an abandoned military reservation, to be used for public purposes. It is a matter of interest probably that the Government used it until 1895 for the purpose of keeping confined some Apache Indians, among whom was their chief, Geronimo. Since that time the institution has been used by the State of Alabama for a hospital for the colored insane. These 180 acres of land adjoin the reservation. The land is a part of the reservation which has been abandoned and is practically worthless.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under general law this land could have been sold upon public appraisal, and I suppose the reason why it has not been sold is because it is not of any value.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Practically of no value whatsoever. It is simply desired to put a fence around it and keep depredators off the property.

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the reservation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described lands contiguous to the Searcy Hospital for the Colored Insane, to wit, all of fractional section one, township one north, range one west, Saint Stephen's meridian, south of Cedar Creek and west of John Chastang's private land grant, containing 181.41 acres, be, and the same are hereby, granted to the State of Alabama for the use of the said hospital, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to issue a patent to said State for the same: Provided, That the said State shall not have the right to sell or convey the lands herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described, and in the event of attempted alienation or failure to use said lands for the purposes hereinbefore described the same shall revert to the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 5, after the word "west" insert the words "Saint Stephen's meridian."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, was laid on the table.

G. FRED ROACH AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7780) for the relief of G. Fred Roach and others.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to obtain some general information about the operation of the desert-land law.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] to make that statement.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the report, and it inclines me to favor the bill; but I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Idaho as to what is required in order to perfect an entry and get title under the desert-land law.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, the desert land law provides that an entry may be made on arid lands, or lands which require irrigation in order to make them productive, to the extent of 320 acres. It also provides that each year for three years there shall be expended upon the land $1 for each acre entered, and within five years from date of entry water must be placed upon the land in sufficient quantity to raise crops in order to secure title.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is sufficient information for my purposes, because the bill shows that these men have a meritorious defense for not complying with the requirements of the law, because they entered service in the World War. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That G. Fred Roach, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016552 for the east half southeast quarter, southwest quarter southeast quarter, southeast quarter southwest quarter, and the west half southwest quarter of section 13, and the east half southeast quarter section 14, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian; Grant H. Geddes, assignee of Richard S. Webber, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016516 for the north half section 24, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian; A. William Malone, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016517 for the south half section 24, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian; and Mabel S. Roach, who made desert-land entry Salt Lake City serial 016553 for the northeast quarter, east half northwest quarter, and northeast quarter southwest quarter section 25, township 21 south, range 5 west, Salt Lake meridian, all of which entries were allowed on April 6, 1916, be, and they are hereby, authorized to complete title to the lands embraced in their respective entries upon the payment of the sum of $1.25 per acre for the lands so entered to the receiver of the United States land office at Salt Lake City, Utah, within 90 days from the approval of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, line 14, after the word "payment," insert "of any balance unpaid."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. VESTAL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OLIVER A. CAMPBELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5125) for the relief of Oliver A. Campbell.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SALE OF LANDS ON WIND RIVER RESERVATION.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4069) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands on the Wind River Reservation, Wyo.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a bill for the sale of lands on Wind River Reservation, Wyo. The report contains nothing from the Secretary of the Interior in regard to this question I particularly want to ask, which is, where do the proceeds go, into the tribal fund of these Indians or into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. STAFFORD. I should say as a general proposition that funds derived from the sale of lands belonging to Indians would redound to the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And go into the fund held in the Indian Bureau which is withheld from the Indians.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman calls for the regular order. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

ALBERT H. RAYNOLDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill S. 901, an act for the payment of certain money to Albert H. Raynolds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

AMENDING THE INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill S. 1894, an act to amend section 26 of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs," etc.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 26 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922," approved March 3, 1921, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to the list of members of the Quapaw Tribe therein enumerated, after the words Lucy Lottson Beaver, the names of three omitted members, to wit, Minnie Griffin, Lewis Quapaw, and Leona Quapaw, in order that the said named Indians may have the full benefit of the 25-year extension period provided by the act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NASH MOTORS CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3279) to refund certain duties paid by the Nash Motors Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

M. FEITEL HOUSE WRECKING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1372) for the relief of the M. Feitel House Wrecking Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the M. Feitel House Wrecking Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $282.41, same representing a shortage of 236 cords of wood sold by the Government but never delivered to said M. Feitel House Wrecking Co., on August 18, 1920.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the figures in line 6, page 1, "$282.41," and insert "$292.41."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DUPRÉ, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ROLPH NAVIGATION & COAL CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1408) authorizing the Rolph Navigation & Coal Co. to sue the United States to recover damages resulting from collision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, what is the necessity of this bill? This seems to be a bill to authorize a company to sue in the district court of the United States. Under the existing law can not the company go into the Court of Claims?

Mr. EDMONDS. No; it is a case of collision between a United States boat and a private ship of some kind. There is a dispute as to the cause of the collision; neither side agrees that they were in the wrong, and the only way and place to settle that is in a court of admiralty.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There is no relief under existing law?

Mr. EDMONDS. None at all; we have passed hundreds of these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 1408) authorizing the Rolph Navigation & Coal Co. to sue the United States to recover damages resulting from collisions.

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Rolph Navigation & Coal Co., a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of California, with its principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco, in said State, owner of the barkentine Hesperian, for damages caused by collision between said vessel and the destroyer Rizal, a naval vessel belonging to the United States, in the Bay of San Francisco on the 26th day of November, 1919, may be sued for and submitted to the United States district court in and for the northern district of California, sitting as a court in admiralty, and acting under the rules in admiralty, governing said court, in an action in which said Rolph Navigation & Coal Co. is hereby authorized to commence against the United States for the recovery of said damages. Said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine said action and enter its judgment or decree therein for the amount of such damages, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of said Rolph Navigation & Coal Co., or against the Rolph Navigation & Coal Co. in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and according to the measure of liability prevailing in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such notice of said action shall be given upon or after the commencement of said action to the Attorney General of the United States, as may be provided by order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General upon receipt of such notice to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear for and defend the United States in such action: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That the claim of said Rolph Navigation & Coal Co., owner of the coal barge Alden Besse, for damages caused by collision between said vessel and the destroyer Buchanan, a naval vessel belonging to the United States, in the Bay of San Francisco on the 1st day of September, 1919, may be sued for and submitted to the United States district court in and for the northern district of California, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules in admiralty governing said court, in an action which said Rolph Navigation & Coal Co. is hereby authorized to commence against the United States for the recovery of said damages. The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARTHUR J. BURDICK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4356) for the relief of Arthur J. Burdick.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JOHN BURKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6523) for the relief of John Burke, former Treasurer of the United States, for lost bonds without the fault or negligence on the part of said former Treasurer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be first reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill being reported [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of second Liberty loan converted 4¼ per cent bonds to the face amount of $5,000, and for the payment of an amount of interest equivalent to the interest of $5,000, face amount of such bonds, from November 15, 1918, to the interest payment date next preceding the delivery of such bonds, for the purpose of the relief of John Burke, former Treasurer of the United States, on account of the loss of second Liberty loan converted 4¼ per cent coupon bonds Nos. 1141320, 1141321, 1141322, 1141323, and 1141324, in the denomination of $1,000 each, contained in a sealed registered package forwarded to the Treasury Department by the Peoples National Bank, of Hillsboro, Ill., to be held as security for deposits of postal savings funds to be placed with said bank, which registered package containing said bonds was lost without fault on the part of the said John Burke, former Treasurer of the United States.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the sum of $2,950, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of second Liberty loan bonds to the face amount of $2,700, and for the payment of an amount of interest equivalent to the interest on $2,700 face amount of such bonds from May 15, 1920, to the interest payment date next preceding the delivery of such bonds, and the sum of $250, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purchase, at not more than par and accrued interest, of third Liberty loan bonds to the face amount of $250 and for the payment of an amount of interest equivalent to the interest on $250 face amount of such third Liberty loan bonds from March 15, 1920, to the interest payment date next preceding the date of delivery of such bonds for the purpose of the relief of the Treasurer of the United States on account of the loss of second Liberty loan coupon bonds Nos. 12603, 12604, 12605, and 378701, in denominations of $500 each, 704008, 704024, 830898, 830922, 2087501, and 2087515, in denominations of $100 each, 1230424 and 1230425, in denominations of $50 each, and third Liberty loan coupon bonds Nos. 333481 and 333482, in denominations of $100 each, and 60891, in the denomination of $50, representing a part of the contents of a sealed registered package forwarded to the Treasury Department by the First National Bank of Fairmount, N. Dak., to be exchanged for registered bonds of like denominations, which registered package was lost without fault or negligence of John Burke, former Treasurer of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CORRECTION OF ACCOUNT OF JOHN BURKE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6524) to permit the correction of the general account of John Burke, former Treasurer of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department are authorized and directed to examine and state an account of the items of unavailable funds as set forth in House Document No. 756, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, and letter from the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, dated January 5, 1921, and to credit the general account of John Burke, former Treasurer of the United States, with the amount thereof: Provided, That the credit herein authorized shall be made in such manner as to debit the individual or depositary chargeable therewith upon the books of the Treasury Department: Provided further, That upon the recovery or payment of any part of said unavailable funds the same shall be deposited in the Treasury in such manner as to debit the Treasurer of the United States in his general account and to credit the individual or depositary charged therewith upon the books of the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. Can the chairman of the committee give any explanation as to the reason why the Guaranty Trust Co. refused to pay the forged check which it cashed, when all of the other banks acknowledged as to other checks that the indorsement was a forgery and paid back the sum to the Government?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think that the case is now on appeal in the court in New York. Is not that the case the gentleman speaks of?

Mr. STAFFORD. I direct the gentleman's attention to the report on page 4:

Checks stolen from outgoing office mail of disbursing officer, raised in amounts and cashed on forged indorsements, $5,027.68.

Some time during the month of December, 1918, one Edward Eric Verrill, an officer in the Army, stole checks after the same had been put in the outgoing mail box of Disbursing Officer James E. Young, Quartermaster Corps, symbol No. 20258, and after getting cashiers in different banks to O. K. the checks he raised them and then cashed them until he received approximately $65,000. These checks, of course, came into the Treasurer's Accounting Division and reclamation was made upon the banks, and all of the banks involved recognized their liability and refunded the amounts paid on the checks excepting the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, which refused to pay.

Legally the Guaranty Trust Co. was just as liable to refund to the Government as these other banks, and I am inquiring the reason for the Guaranty Trust Co. taking that exceptional position.

Mr. EDMONDS. In answer to the gentleman I would say that I went over all these cases personally with Mr. Burke——

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question but that Mr. Burke should be relieved of responsibility, but as far as the instant case is concerned the Government is crediting the account of the Treasurer with the amount paid by him, whereas in the other instances the Government has received the money from the banks.

Mr. EDMONDS. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this man has been arrested, and they claim to have sufficient security in his automobile and other effects.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, yes; that same claim might have been raised by all of these other banks who cashed the various checks of which this man was a forger, but the Guaranty Trust Co. was the only one that objected to meeting this legal obligation in cashing a forged check drawn on the Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am afraid that I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think anybody can answer it. It is only a case where a great corporation declines to pay its legal obligation to the Government, whereas all of the other banks have paid their legal obligations and credited it to profit and loss.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would say to the Members of the House that the country is to be congratulated upon having as faithful and honest a servant as Mr. Burke. He personally came up to the committee and went over all these different accounts with us. He may have told me something about the Guaranty Trust Co. case, but I do not remember what it is now.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish my inquiry to be taken as having any reflection on John Burke, because there can not be any reflection upon him. The reflection is on the Guaranty Trust Co. for failing to meet its legal obligation.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is this discussion in order after the vote has been announced by the Chair upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The vote was not announced.

Mr. CROWTHER. Did not the Chair announce the vote?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. It appears in the report that this man who forged checks had the cashiers in the various banks O. K. the checks before he raised them, but in the forgery of the checks which the Guaranty Trust Co. cashed the cashier did not O. K. them, and he did not raise them. He did not get the cashier of that company to O. K. the checks. The gentleman will find that in the next paragraph, on page 4 of the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a different case, is it not?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; that goes on in explanation of this.

Mr. STAFFORD. It explains the reason why the Guaranty Trust Co. failed to pay?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I read from the report:

The amount of the checks, No. 50041, dated December 12, 1918, for $95.44, and No. 50047, dated December 12, 1918, for $4,932.24, which were cashed by the Guaranty Trust Co., and for which they refused to settle, is $5,027.68. These checks were made out before they were put in the mail box, and hence the indorsements are forgeries, as well as the amounts to which the checks were raised.

The cashier of the Guaranty Trust Co. did not O. K. the checks before they were cashed, and that is the reason the Guaranty Trust Co. did not pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a distinction without a difference, I believe. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HEIRS AND ASSIGNS OF N. FERRO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8217) to authorize the payment of $872.96 to the Government of Italy for the relief of the heirs and assigns of N. Ferro.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, upon the request of the Secretary of State, to the Italian Government, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $872.96 to reimburse the heirs and assigns of N. Ferro, deceased, formerly Italian consular agent at Gulfport, Miss., for expenses incurred in repairing the damages to the Italian bark Fenice, caused by collision with the United States barge No. 15.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8221) for the relief of the Chinese Government.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims if this bill includes any sum for the payment on account of any death of any subject of the Chinese Government?

Mr. EDMONDS. It does.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How much?

Mr. STAFFORD. Fifty-three dollars and fifty-five cents United States currency.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, over on the next page, Calendar No. 109, there is a bill for the relief of the widow of Chang Tshu Tsao at Hankow, China. This is a case where a sailor threw Mr. Tsao overboard when he went to the ship to collect a little money——

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And we propose to pay this widow $500.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not object, but I think the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs should be here to look after these bills.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is not a bill of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; it is a claims bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Chinese Government, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,413.79 for damages resulting from the sinking of a Chinese junk by the U. S. S. Palos in the Yangtse River, China, on October 19, 1917.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP "TEXAS."

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2153) authorizing the owners of the steamship Texas to bring suit against the United States of America.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the steamer Texas, arising out of a collision between said steamer and the United States steamer Frederick der Grosse, off Tompkinsville, Staten Island, in the harbor of New York, on the 3d day of September, 1917, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owners of said steamer Texas by reason of damages to and detention of said steamer, may be submitted to the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7923) for the relief of the Canadian Pacific Railway Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the Canadian Pacific Railway Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $336, and such sum is hereby appropriated to reimburse the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. for customs fine in connection with shipment of steel castings forwarded to Seattle under Vanceboro immediate transportation entry No. 168, of August 3, 1918, erroneously imposed by the collector of customs at Vanceboro, Me.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MRS. E. H. JACKSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8173) for the relief of Mrs. E. H. Jackson.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $43, which by her was paid to John J. Langston, a recruiting sergeant in the United States marine service, for the purpose of defraying the transportation home of her son, and which amount the said sergeant appropriated to his own use, and thereafter deserted, and is now a deserter, there being more than a sufficient amount due by the Government to said sergeant at the time of his desertion to reimburse the said Mrs. E. H. Jackson, but which pay was forfeited to the Government at the time said sergeant deserted.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Texas is here; if so, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BOX rose.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I mean the gentleman who introduced the bill?

Mr. BOX. I did not introduced the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I wanted to know if any effort has been made to collect this money from the sergeant?

Mr. EDMONDS. The sergeant is still a deserter. We have not been able to find him. He is a deserter now.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Was any effort ever made to get the money from him?

Mr. EDMONDS. We have not found him yet.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There is some effort to find the gentleman from Texas.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WIDOW OF CHANG TSU TSAO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8216) for the relief of the widow of Chang Tsu Tsao, of Hankow, China.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is not payment usually made to the Government in place of the individual?

Mr. EDMONDS. In this case the form of the bill was recommended by the department; that is all I know.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It occurred to me the usual practice was to make the money payable to the Chinese Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. I believe representation was made by the Government to the State Department and the State Department proposed this form of the bill. They evidently knew what they were doing and they said they wanted to hurry it out because it would aid our relations between the two nations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation is hereby authorized, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, of the sum of $1,000, to be paid to the widow of Chang Tsu Tsao, a Chinese citizen of Hankow, China, as indemnity for the death of her husband, which was caused by his being thrown from a vessel of the United States Navy by an enlisted man of said Navy on or about September 4, 1920.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

In line 5, page 1, strike out "$1,000" and insert "$500."

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BUFFALO HOUSEWRECKING & SALVAGE CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1721) to authorize the refund of a part of the purchase price of Camp Mills to the Buffalo Housewrecking & Salvage Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the bill in question based on the fact that certain mess kitchens were claimed to have been sold when they were not used in the camp in question? Is the chairman of the committee prepared to say that when the sale was made of this camp that there was no inventory or no written evidence of what the bid for the purchase of the camp would cover?

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee did not go into that very much, because the department itself certified to the Auditor of the Treasury Department a refund to these people, and the auditor of the department refused to pay it because he had no funds. It is very evident that the department, if they had had funds, would have repaid this party. It was simply because there were no funds in the Treasury Department for that particular purpose.

Mr. CRAMTON. And the gentlemen of the committee have not called for any written evidence of what was the nature of the contract, although the payment requested here is to be made upon such contract?

Mr. EDMONDS. The presumption of the committee would naturally be that if the department had funds down there and could have paid this, they would have paid it, and we would never have heard of it. If the department is willing to certify they owe this man so much money, certainly we have no defense from paying it.

Mr. CRAMTON. As I understand, the department certified it by setting up certain facts of the verbal conversation of some subordinate officer. There must be a written contract.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman withhold it in order that I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold it.

Mr. OSBORNE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. MCDUFFIE] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the rivers and harbors of Alabama by inserting an address which he delivered recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman extending his remarks on the subject indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand temporarily, because this is the last bill under consideration.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the unknown soldier.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the unknown soldier dead. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will withhold that point of order. It is now 4 o'clock. I was in hopes we could run until about 5 and get through this calendar.

Mr. CROWTHER. I will withdraw it; but this is the second bill of my colleague's that did not receive consideration. Other bills get through.

Mr. MONDELL. There is only one bill on this calendar that I had an interest in, and that was objected to. I am not making any complaint at all.

Mr. CROWTHER. I withdraw the point.

Mr. MONDELL. I think gentlemen are objecting in good faith—I am sure they are—and if they object to our bills in good faith, really, we have no grounds of objection.

Mr. CRAMTON. There has been no objection made, but we have been trying for a few minutes to get information. If time will be granted to get that information, objection may not be made; but if we are cut short objection will be made now.

Mr. EDMONDS. The report shows in the last paragraph as follows:

The Board of Sales, after careful consideration, approved an allowance to the Buffalo House Wrecking & Salvage Co. of the amount realized by the Government from the sale of the kitchens in question, which, as noted in the foregoing list, was determined to be $1,800. In the meantime, the purchase price of $327,300 had been covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and for this reason no deduction could be made therefrom. There was no appropriation from which payment of the claim could be made by the War Department. The claim was certified to the Auditor for the War Department for payment, but he had no funds available for that purpose. During the last session of Congress there was a bill introduced for the relief of the claimant which was favorably reported upon by the War Department.

Of course, if the Government has no defense in the War Department, there is nothing we could say or do that would in any way prevent their collection if they had legal redress in court.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. As I understand the report—and I would like to ask the chairman of the committee—the Government sold to this salvage company mess kitchens which had already been sold to other persons, and these mess kitchens had yielded to the Government the sum of $1,800, and it is now proposed to credit the salvage company with $1,800 by paying that amount?

Mr. EDMONDS. That is it exactly.

Mr. CRAMTON. The only question is I have not understood that the sales of camps of this kind included a lot of miscellaneous property that was attached to the camp. It does not appear in the report, and the chairman of the committee is not prepared to say whether there was a written inventory of the articles covered by the bid. If so, it seems to me the House is entitled to that information as to whether or not these mess kitchens were included in the written inventory.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will read further in the report——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The report does say that Lieut. Robert Brown, at the direction of the utilities officer in charge, told the prospective purchaser that the mess kitchens were included in the sale of the camp, and took him around and showed him what they were.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman think that in any ordinary court that evidence would stand in preference to the written contract?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think we are proceeding here generally the way we do in court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1721) to authorize the refund of a part of the purchase price of Camp Mills to the Buffalo Housewrecking & Salvage Co.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Buffalo Housewrecking & Salvage Co., of Buffalo, N. Y., the sum of $1,800, as refund to said company because of the sale of certain buildings at Camp Mills by the Government, after inspection of the camp by the above-named company, which purchased Camp Mills, and after the said company had been informed that said buildings were included in the sale of said camp.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CLEVELAND TRINIDAD PAVING CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6437) for the relief of the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co., of Cleveland, Ohio.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6437) for the relief of the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co., of Cleveland, Ohio.

Whereas on February 7, 1910, a permit was granted to the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, by the Department of the Interior, to remove sand from a tract of land reserved for the Cheyenne Indian School on certain conditions, including the payment by said company of the sum of $100 per acre for such privilege. Said tract of land embraced 10.95 acres in the State of Oklahoma and the said paving company thereafter paid to the department the sum of $1,095 to the superintendent of the Cheyenne and Arapahoe School, who placed the same in the fund known as "Miscellaneous receipts, class 4"; and

Whereas by some misunderstanding as to the proper description of the tracts of land covered by the permit issued to the said paving company by the Department of the Interior, the greater part of said land was sold under an act of Congress, approved June 17, 1910, which act provided for the sale of certain tracts of land no longer required for use in connection with the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indian School, and that by reason of said sale the said company was deprived to a very large extent of the privileges for which it had paid the said sum of $1,095; and

Whereas the records of the department show that the company could reasonably anticipate procuring some 100,000 cubic yards of commercial sand from said tract, while, due to the above-cited circumstances, slightly over 6,000 cubic yards was obtained by the company; and

Whereas the records of the Interior Department further show it was the intention of the department to withhold from the sale the tract of land covered by the permit issued to the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co. in order to protect the rights of the company under its permit; and

Whereas the said company, by reason of the issuance to it of the said permit, incurred large expense in the construction of a railroad spur, the purchase and shipment of valuable machinery which was installed by the company on said tract of land, and by reason of the failure of the Interior Department to withhold said tract of land from the sale of lands authorized under the said act of June 17, 1910, the said company was deprived of the privileges it was entitled to under the terms of said permit and thereupon filed its claim for the sum of $3,017, exclusive of the depreciation of its machinery as a reasonable amount of the loss said company sustained thereby: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to the Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,017.

CHARLES R. POWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1459) for the relief of Charles R. Powell.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is a bill reported by the Committee on the Public Lands yesterday. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GENSMAN], the author of the bill, is here. I would like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill permits a man by the name of Charles R. Powell to make a homestead entry in what is known as "The Big Pasture" in the old Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian country in Oklahoma.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GENSMAN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any oil rights pertaining to this land?

Mr. GENSMAN. There are oil rights to be conveyed in the sale of the land; but I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that some friends and myself have had it demonstrated to our satisfaction that there is no oil on the north bank of Red River; it seems to have all been found on the Texas side.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of an objection.

Mr. GENSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a further statement for the benefit of the Members, as this is a meritorious bill and I do hope no one will further object to its passage. It is getting late, and I hope we can pass this bill before we adjourn.

This act is for the purpose of permitting Charles R. Powell to purchase the southwest quarter of section 35, township 2 south, range 13 west, Indian meridian, Cotton County, Okla., at the original price bid by Bernard J. Specking, the said Specking having bid the land in at a sale which was well advertised, and after paying one-fifth of the purchase price, amounting to $324, and having been contested for failure to reside upon and cultivate same, forfeited his rights to the Government. While there is no reason in the records for Mr. Specking having failed to establish residence upon this land, by examination of the land in question and the records of near-by lands one can easily see why Mr. Specking chose to forfeit his payment and right to the land, the reason being he bid too much for it, there being no land in that vicinity bringing as much as the tract purchased by Specking, which fact is stated in an affidavit filed with the honorable Secretary of the Interior and executed by Charles F. Blick, who purchased the northwest quarter of the same section. Mr. Blick resided upon his homestead for several years and knew the relative values of the land in that section of the country. Another way to reach a fair value of this land is to obtain the records from the General Land Office showing a recent appraisement of the southeast quarter of section 13, township 3 south, range 13 west, which has recently been made by the Indian Department as provided by the act of March 3, 1919.

This tract was originally purchased by Charles O. Gooding and covered by entry No. 06616, Guthrie, Okla., land office. Samuel M. Hardin contested this entry under the act of March 3, 1919, and Mr. Gooding, having bought the land at too high a price, relinquished the same. Mr. Hardin asked for reappraisement, and the Indian Department reduced the price of same from $2,000 to $1,318 and allowed $100 of that amount for fence on the land. Thus, it will be seen that in every instance where land was forfeited in the big pasture it was where same had been purchased at too high a price considering its improved condition. Since Charles R. Powell is now a resident upon this land and has complied in every way with the homestead laws in such cases, the passage of this act will only give him his rights as he could have exercised as a homesteader had it not been for the fact that the land office erred in canceling the entry of Specking at the time Virgie Faulkinbury contested the entry of Specking. Said land could not have been legally contested at that time except for fraud, which mistake was corrected in many instances by reinstatement of entries. Had the entry of Specking been restored and left intact as it should have been and Specking defaulted in residence and cultivation as he has, then the present claimant, Charles R. Powell, could have obtained a right to same under the act of March 3, 1919, and eventually secured patent after proof of as much as 14 months' residence and cultivation and by paying the original purchase price. Since he has resided upon, cultivated, and improved the said tract amply, as shown by the report of the honorable Secretary of the Interior, to make proof under the homestead laws and is now ready and willing to pay the original purchase to the Government, if permitted to do so, and obtain title for a home for himself and his family, it seems that the only fair and equitable thing to do would be to enact this measure for his relief, and thus make one more home owner.

I have several precedents for such legislation as this, but I will only cite one for your information in the big pasture, and that is in the case of S. S. Markley, a bill for his relief having been passed at the recent session of Congress, permitting him to purchase the northeast quarter of section 3, township 3 south, range 12 west, at the original price bid by Mr. Ross, Mr. Ross having forfeited his right in the same manner as Mr. Specking and there being no law permitting anyone to enter same under the homestead laws. Mr. Markley now holds title to this land, and the Government, the State, county, and community having profited by the vesting of the title in another home owner and taxpayer.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to sell to Charles R. Powell, within a period of 90 days from and after the passage of this act, at the original purchase price, the southwest quarter of section 35, township 2 south, range 13 west, Indian meridian, Cotton County, Okla., and issue to him a patent therefor.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GENSMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL WEDNESDAY NEXT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I do this, Mr. Speaker, in the belief that the tax bill is not likely to reach the House until Wednesday. I doubt if the Senate will pass the tax bill on Monday, but if it does the probability is it could not be prepared, in view of the great number of amendments, in time to be messaged over to the House until very late Tuesday, if at all, so that I do not think there will be any delay if we stand adjourned until Wednesday.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the bill should be messaged to the House on Wednesday—of course, it could only then be messaged if we adjourn over until then—would it then be the expectation of the gentleman that on Thursday the movement would be made to send it to conference?

Mr. MONDELL. That was my thought.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman desires, as I understand, that the bill be received and printed. My information is that the bill probably will pass the Senate Monday night, but, of course, I do not know whether it will.

Mr. MONDELL. We have been optimistic in regard to the passage of the bill through the Senate, and have been hoping for its passage for some time, but I doubt if it will pass Monday. If it does, it will be late Monday night.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then we can be assured——

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, as the gentleman knows, we have assured Members on both sides that we would transact no important business on Tuesday, which is election day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If we could get the measure, of course there would be no reason for our not being in session on Tuesday, with the understanding that there should be no business done. The particular thing in which I am interested—and I am asking it for the benefit of many Members—is this: If the bill does come back on Wednesday, then will the movement to send it to conference come up on Thursday?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; it will.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman knows the conditions, and he proposes to give us at least 24 hours to look over the measure to see what kind of an instrument it is after it has been printed.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that it would be proper not to take it up until Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHELTON for two weeks, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the House, under the order previously made, adjourned until Wednesday, November 9, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

TITLE XV. ADJUSTED COMPENSATION.

PART I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS.

DEFINITIONS.

SEC. 1500. This act may be cited as the "World War adjusted compensation act."

SEC. 1501. As used in this title—

The term "veteran" includes any individual, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States at any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918; but does not include (1) any individual at any time during such period or thereafter separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions, (2) any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform, or (3) any alien at any time during such period or thereafter discharged from the military or naval forces on account of his alienage; and

The term "adjusted service pay" means the amount of the payment to which the veteran would be entitled under the provisions of Part II of this title.

OPTIONAL PLANS.

SEC. 1502. Each veteran shall have the right to avail himself of any one, but only one, of the following plans:

(1) To receive "adjusted service pay," as provided in Part II;

(2) To receive an "adjusted service certificate" as provided in Part III;

(3) To receive "vocational training aid," as provided in Part IV;

(4) To receive "farm or home aid," as provided in Part V; or

(5) To receive "land settlement aid," as provided in Part VI.

APPLICATION BY VETERAN.

SEC. 1503. (a) The veteran's choice among the plans enumerated in section 1502 shall be made by application filed with the Secretary of War, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; or with the Secretary of the Navy, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

(b) Such application may be made at any time after the passage and approval of this act.

(c) An application shall be made (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity or absence from the continental United States prevents the making of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe. An application made by a representative other than one required by any such regulation shall be held void.

(d) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly make any regulations necessary to the efficient administration of the provisions of this section.

PROOF OF VETERAN'S CHOICE OF PLAN.

SEC. 1504. (a) As soon as practicable after the receipt of a valid application, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury, if the veteran has chosen an adjusted service certificate, or to the Federal Board for Vocational Education if the veteran has chosen vocational-training aid, or to the Secretary of the Interior if the veteran has chosen farm or home aid, or land settlement aid, a certificate setting forth:

(1) That the applicant is a veteran;

(2) His name and address;

(3) The plan chosen; and

(4) The amount of adjusted service pay to which he would be entitled if he had chosen that plan.

(b) Upon receipt of such certificate, the officer or board to which it is transmitted shall proceed to extend to the veteran the benefits conferred by the plan chosen, at the time, in the manner, and under the conditions provided for in the part of this title covering such plan.

PUBLICITY.

SEC. 1505 (a) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall, as soon as practicable after the passage and approval of this act, jointly prepare and publish a pamphlet or pamphlets containing a digest and explanation of the provisions of this title, accompanied by such statements as to the comparative advantages of each of the plans enumerated in section 1502, as may be of assistance to veterans in making their choice among such plans; and shall from time to time thereafter jointly prepare and publish such additional or supplementary information as may be found necessary.

(b) The officer or board having charge of the administration of any plan or part thereof enumerated in section 1502 shall transmit to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy as soon as practicable after the passage and approval of this act full information and explanations as to the matters of which such officer or board has charge, which shall be considered by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in preparing the publications referred to in subdivision (a).

(c) The publications provided for in subdivision (a) shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may determine to be most effective to inform veterans of their rights under this title.

STATISTICS.

SEC. 1506. Immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall ascertain the individuals who are veterans as defined in section 1501, and, as to each veteran, the number of days of overseas service and of home service, as defined in section 1520, for which he is entitled to receive adjusted service pay; and their decisions shall not be subject to review by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATIONS.

SEC. 1507. Any officer or board charged with the administration of any plan under this title, or of any part thereof, shall make such regulations, not inconsistent with this title, as may be necessary to the efficient administration of the matter of which such officer or board has charge.

DEDUCTION OF OVERPAYMENTS.

SEC. 1508. After computing the amount of payment to be made to the veteran under any one of the plans enumerated in section 1502, or after using his adjusted service pay as the basis for any computation under this title, there shall be deducted from the amount thus obtained the amount of any overpayment previously made in respect to the service of the veteran in the military or naval forces.

SEC. 1509. Any officer or board charged with the administration of any plan under this title or of any part thereof shall make a full report to Congress on the first Monday of December of each year.

SEC. 1510. No sum payable under this title to a veteran, or to his estate, or to any beneficiary named under Part III, shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under legal or equitable process.

PART II.—ADJUSTED SERVICE PAY.

SEC. 1520. As used in this part—

The term "overseas service" means service on shore in Europe or Asia, exclusive of China, Japan, and the Philippine Islands; and service afloat, including the period from the date of embarkation for such service to the date of disembarkation on return from such service, both dates inclusive; and

The term "home service" means all service not overseas service.

SEC. 1521. There shall be paid to any veteran, upon application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 and in addition to any other amounts due him in pursuance of law, the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of overseas service and $1 for each day of home service, but the amount payable to a veteran who performed no overseas service shall not exceed $500, and the amount payable to a veteran who performed any overseas service shall not exceed $625.

SEC. 1522. (a) No such payment shall be made to—

(1) Any commissioned officer above the grade of captain in the Army or Marine Corps, lieutenant in the Navy, first lieutenant or first lieutenant of engineers in the Coast Guard, or passed assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service, or having the pay and allowances, if not the rank, of any officer superior in rank to any of such grades—in each case for the period of service as such;

(2) Any individual holding a permanent or provisional commission or permanent or acting warrant in any branch of the military or naval forces, for the period of service under such commission or warrant after the accrual of the right to pay thereunder;

(3) Any civilian officer or employee of any branch of the military or naval forces, contract surgeon, cadet of the United States Military Academy, midshipman, cadet of the Coast Guard, member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, member of the Students' Army Training Corps (except an enlisted man detailed thereto), member of the United States Guards, member of a development battalion (except an officer or enlisted man detailed thereto), member of the United States Disciplinary Barrack Guard, Philippine Scout, member of the Philippine Guard, member of the Philippine Constabulary, member of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, member of the National Guard of Hawaii, member of the insular force of the Navy, member of the Samoan native guard and band of the Navy, or Indian Scout—in each case for the period of service as such;

(4) Any individual entering the military or naval forces after November 11, 1918—for any period after such entrance;

(5) Any individual originally entering the service for special or limited service only—for the period of such special or limited service not overseas service;

(6) Any individual performing home service not with troops and receiving commutation of quarters or of subsistence—for the period of such service;

(7) Any member of the Public Health Service—for any period during which he was not detailed for duty with the Army or the Navy;

(8) Any individual granted a farm or industrial furlough—for the period of such furlough;

(9) Any individual detailed for work on roads or other highway construction or repair work—for the period during which his pay was equalized to conform to the compensation paid to civilian employees in the same or like employment, pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919;

(10) Any individual who has been absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or from other misconduct—for the period of such absence; or

(11) Any individual who has been absent without proper authority for more than one day, or in confinement under sentence or awaiting trial and disposition of his case, if the trial resulted in conviction—for the period of such absence or confinement.

(b) The periods referred to in paragraphs (5) and (6) of subdivision (a) may be included in the case of any individual if and to the extent that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy jointly find that such service subjected such individual to exceptional hazard. A full statement of all action under this subdivision shall be included in the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy required by section 1509.

(c) In computing the payments to any veteran under this part effect shall be given to all paragraphs of subdivision (a) which are applicable.

(d) If part of the service is overseas service and part is home service, the home service shall first be used in computing the sixty days' period referred to in section 1521.

(e) For the purpose of computing the sixty days' period referred to in section 1521, any period of service after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, in the military or naval forces in any capacity may be included, notwithstanding payment for such period, or a part thereof, is prohibited under the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section, except that the periods referred to in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subdivision (a) shall not be included.

(f) For the purpose of section 1521, in the case of members of the National Guard or of the National Guard Reserve called into service by the proclamation of the President dated July 3, 1917, the time of service between the date of call into the service as specified in such proclamation and August 5, 1917, both dates inclusive, shall be deemed to be active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

SEC. 1523. (a) The payments authorized by the provisions of this title shall be made in installments, beginning on the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the fifteenth day after the date of filing the application, but not before January 1, 1923, as follows: (1) If the total amount payable is $500 or over, in 10 equal quarterly installments; and (2) if the total amount payable is less than $500, in quarterly installments of $50; except that any installment necessary to complete the payments may be less than $50.

(b) If before the completion of the installment payments the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further installments shall be paid. Payment shall be made by the Secretary of War if the veteran is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; and by the Secretary of the Navy, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

SEC. 1524. If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 for adjusted service pay and before receiving all the installment payments, the payments authorized by the provisions of this part shall be made to his estate.

SEC. 1525. No right to adjusted service pay under the provisions of this part shall be assignable or serve as security for any loan. Any assignment or loan made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be held void. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall not pay the amount of adjusted service pay to any person other than the veteran or his estate or such representative of the veteran as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe.

PART III.—ADJUSTED SERVICE CERTIFICATES.

SEC. 1530. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, is hereby directed to issue, without cost to the veteran designated therein, an adjusted service certificate (hereinafter in this part referred to as a "certificate") of a face value equal to the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran increased by 40 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon for 20 years at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually (such amount being approximately equal to three and thirty-eight hundredths times the adjusted service pay of the veteran). The certificate and all rights conferred under the provisions of this part shall take effect as of the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the date of filing the application, but not before January 1, 1923. The veteran shall name the beneficiary of the certificate and may from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, alter such beneficiary. The amount of the face value of the certificate shall be payable (1) to the veteran 20 years after it becomes effective or (2) upon the death of the veteran prior thereto to the beneficiary named; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, the amount of the certificate shall be paid to the estate of the veteran.

SEC. 1531. There is hereby established in the Treasury a revolving fund, to be known as the "adjusted service certificate loan fund" (hereinafter in this part referred to as the "fund"). The Postmaster General is authorized to make loans out of such fund upon the certificate of any veteran. The amount of such loans to any one veteran outstanding at any one time shall not exceed—

(a) If the loan is made during the third to fifth years, inclusive, after the certificate becomes effective, 90 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran, plus (2) interest thereon from the date the certificate becomes effective, to the time of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually; or,

(b) If the loan is made during the sixth to twentieth year, inclusive, after the certificate becomes effective, 80 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran increased by 40 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon from the date the certificate becomes effective, to the time of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually.

SEC. 1532. Moneys in the fund shall be available to make all loans upon certificates. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to set aside out of the fund such reserve moneys as may be required to make such loans, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest the remainder of the moneys in the fund in interest-bearing obligations of the United States. Such obligations may, at the discretion of the Secretary, be sold and the proceeds reinvested in other interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and shall be sold and the proceeds made available for the purposes of the fund, whenever the Postmaster General certifies that in his opinion further amounts are required for the purposes of the fund. Any moneys in such fund not deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes of this part shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 1533. No loan shall be made upon any certificate within two years after the certificate becomes effective. Application for loans may be made to any postmaster of a first, second, or third class post office. The veteran shall give a note for the repayment of the loan upon an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual installments sufficient to cover (1) interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum and (2) such amount of the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period not exceeding the life of the certificate. The veteran may, however, pay any or all installments of the principal previous to their due date. The Postmaster General shall by regulation prescribe the form of application and the duration, number, and amount of installments, and such other conditions as he deems advisable, of the loan. All payments in respect to the loan shall be made through a first, second, or third class post office. Any moneys received for the repayment of the loan shall be covered into the fund. Whenever the Postmaster General finds that the borrower is in arrears for more than two years in his installments upon the note or has violated any other conditions thereof, he shall certify such fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon declare the certificate of the borrower to be forfeited.

SEC. 1534. No certificate issued or right conferred under the provisions of this part shall be negotiable or assignable or serve as security for a loan other than one made under the provisions of section 1531. Any loan made in violation of any provision of this section shall be held void. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury finds that any such certificate or right has been negotiated or assigned, or has served as security, in violation of a provision of this section, the rights of the veteran under this part shall be forfeited.

SEC. 1535. In the case of the death of the borrower or the forfeiture of his certificate or rights under this part, any loan made upon the certificate and the note in respect thereto shall be deemed canceled. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon reimburse the Postmaster General for all unpaid installments upon any canceled loan; and in case such loan has been canceled as a result of the death of the borrower the Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct the amount of such reimbursement from the amount of the face value of the certificate in respect to which the loan is made.

SEC. 1536. Any certificate issued under the provisions of this part shall have printed upon its face the conditions and terms upon which it is issued and to which it is subject.

SEC. 1537. If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 and before the certificate becomes effective, the amount of the adjusted service pay of the veteran shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to his estate.

PART IV.—VOCATIONAL TRAINING AID.

SEC. 1540. The Federal Board for Vocational Education (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "board") upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, is hereby directed to pay to the veteran designated therein (if he is not receiving the benefits of the vocational rehabilitation act, as amended) the sum of $1.75 for each day of his attendance (on or after Jan. 1, 1923), on a course of vocational training previously approved by the board as suitable for such veteran. Such payment shall be made without deduction for Sundays, holidays, or vacations not exceeding two weeks in duration, or for absence for other cause which the board deems justifiable; but the total payment shall not exceed 140 per cent of the amount of adjusted service pay which the veteran would be entitled to receive if he had chosen that plan.

Payments under this section shall be made monthly, or at more frequent intervals, as the board may determine generally or in special cases.

SEC. 1541. The board shall establish such regulations as will insure the regular attendance of the veteran on his course of training, and no sum or sums shall be payable under this part unless the board has been furnished proof of such regular attendance. For each day of unjustifiable absence the veteran shall forfeit the sum payable for that day, and shall receive no reimbursement for it in any other form.

SEC. 1542. (a) If the payment under section 1540 plus the amounts forfeited under section 1541 is less than 140 per cent of the adjusted service pay, either by reason of the duration of the course approved or by reason of the veteran's discontinuing, with the approval of the board, his attendance on his course of training, he shall be entitled to receive an amount equal to the difference between (1) his adjusted service pay and (2) that proportion thereof which the payments made or accrued under section 1540 plus the amounts forfeited under section 1541 bear to 140 per cent of his adjusted service pay: Provided, That from the amount thus computed there shall be deducted an amount equal to the sums forfeited under section 1541.

(b) Such amount shall be paid to him by the board in such installments and at such times as will place him upon the same basis as if he has originally chosen to receive adjusted service pay as provided in part 2.

SEC. 1543. If before the completion of the payments under this part the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further payments shall be made under this part.

SEC. 1544. (a) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 and before any payments have been made or have accrued under this title, the amount of the adjusted service pay of the veteran shall be paid by the board to his estate.

(b) If the veteran dies, after the course of training has begun, his estate shall be paid by the board the same amount as would have been paid to the veteran under subdivision (a) of section 1542, treating for such purposes the date of his death as the date of discontinuance of attendance on his course of training.

(c) The amounts payable under this section shall be payable in the same manner as provided in subdivision (b) of section 1542.

SEC. 1545. (a) The board is hereby authorized to cooperate with State boards for vocational education in such manner as will secure their assistance in the approval of courses of training for veterans, and other assistance in carrying out the provisions of this part.

(b) Whenever any State provides funds for assistance to veterans in attendance upon approved courses or provides for free tuition in approved educational institutions, the board is authorized and directed to cooperate with the State board for vocational education of such State in securing the maximum educational opportunities to veterans entitled to the benefits of this part.

PART V.—FARM OR HOME AID.

SEC. 1550. The Secretary of the Interior upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, is hereby directed, on or after January 1, 1923, to pay to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments, an amount equal to his adjusted service pay increased by 40 per cent.

Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make improvements on a city or suburban home, or a farm not selected under part 6, or to purchase or make payments on such a home or farm.

SEC. 1551. No such payment shall be made unless and until the Secretary of the Interior has approved the purpose for which it is desired by the veteran, and has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose. The Secretary of the Interior may, at the option of the veteran, or on his own motion, make the payment directly to the vendor or other persons to whom such payment is due from the veteran.

SEC. 1552. For the purpose of enabling him to pass upon the desirability of the investment he may make use of the services of land bank appraisers of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be designated by such board.

SEC. 1553. (a) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 1503 for farm or home aid and before a contract has been entered into with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the amount of his adjusted service pay shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior to the estate of the veteran in such installments and at such times as will place the beneficiaries thereof upon the same basis as the veteran would have been if he had originally chosen to receive adjusted service pay as provided in Part II, but no such payment shall be made if the veteran has been separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions or discharged therefrom on account of his alienage.

(b) If before the veteran's death a contract has been entered into with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and payments under this part on such contract are still due, such payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior to the vendor or other person to whom such payments are due from the veteran.

PART VI.—LAND SETTLEMENT.

SEC. 1560. On the opening of public or Indian lands to entry or the restoration of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 60 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal, in which period veterans who have chosen the benefits of this part shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead or desert land laws, if qualified thereunder, except as against prior existing valid settlement rights and as against preference rights conferred by existing laws or equitable claims subject to allowance and confirmation.

Such preference right for such period shall also be accorded on all reclamation projects now in existence or hereafter established, whether such reclamation is made by irrigation, drainage, or other method.

Upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 1504, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, there shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, on or after January 1, 1923, to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments, an amount equal to his adjusted service pay increased by 40 per cent. Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make payments in connection with the lands as to which preference has been given under this section, or for the improvement of any such land, and shall be made only if the Secretary of the Interior has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose.

PART VII.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

SEC. 1570. The officers and boards having charge of the administration of any of the provisions of this title are authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and to make such expenditures for rent, furniture, office equipment, printing, binding, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, stationery, motor-propelled vehicles or trucks used for official purposes, traveling expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence at not exceeding $4 for officers, agents, and other employees, for the purchase of reports and materials for publications, and for other contingent and miscellaneous expenses as may be necessary efficiently to execute the purposes of this title and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time. With the exception of such special experts as may be found necessary for the conduct of the work, all such appointments shall be made subject to the civil service laws, and preference shall, so far as practicable, be given to veterans.

SEC. 1571. Whoever knowingly makes any false or fraudulent statement of a material fact in any application, certificate, or document made under the provisions of Part I, II, III, IV, V, or VI, or of any regulation made under any such part, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 1572. There is hereby appropriated such amount as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this title, to be paid out of and to be a first charge upon the interest received by the United States on obligations of foreign Governments. If at any time the amount of such interest is not sufficient to meet the appropriation hereby made, the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue certificates of indebtedness under section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, as amended, to be redeemed, so far as practicable, out of interest payments on such obligations of foreign Governments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the merits of the bonus proposition, because I do not think it necessary. That question has been fully discussed in this Chamber. It has been much more fully discussed in the country at large.

In the beginning of the agitation with reference to the readjustment of soldiers' compensation there was ground for doubt as to whether the soldiers themselves desired it, and there was equal ground for doubt as to whether the people of the country desired it. I think that the ground for any doubt has long since disappeared. I think it has been made manifest that the soldiers desire and expect and demand it. I think it has been made reasonably manifest that the people of the country have come to the conclusion that if the soldiers want it they should have it, and therefore wish it given to them.

Without reference to individual views upon a question, we must recognize the fact, and I think every Senator recognizes that fact, that under our system of Government we should, if we can do so without violating our oath of office, without doing violence to our conscientious convictions, follow the known wishes of our constituents and let our action reflect their views. I make these remarks with reference to the bonus without any intention to undertake to discuss the merits of the proposition.

It has been stated upon the floor of the Senate that I voted to recommit to the committee the bonus bill introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. That is true. I voted to recommit the bill because I was impressed by the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury and of the President with reference to the deplorable condition of the Treasury. Their statements with reference to the condition of the Treasury agreed with my own view upon that question growing out of my knowledge of the financial condition of the Government, acquired during eight years as chairman of the Finance Committee during Democratic control and since 1919 as ranking Democratic member of that committee.

I knew perfectly well then, as I have known since, that if taxes were to be reduced we could not add any such additional sum as the bonus bill carried to our tax burden. I knew that under the existing law the taxes levied would not provide more than enough income to pay the estimated expenditures of the Government. I knew if we added two or three hundred million dollars to the expenditures of the Government that we would necessarily have to increase the taxes to raise additional revenue and that the demand of the people for a reduction in taxes was in vain. I thought, in the interest of the taxpayer—who I believed to be overburdened, who I know wanted a reduction and ought to have a reduction—and in the interest of the business of the country, taxes ought not to be increased if that result could be avoided. I knew that to provide for the payment of this large additional sum through taxation, as the bonus proposition as presented to the Senate did provide, would greatly embarrass the situation; but, Mr. President, there were other reasons why I voted to recommit.

In the first place, I thought the bill was an unbalanced bill. I had said so and had contended that it was so in the committee. I think so yet. I thought that the bill ought to be corrected in this respect. In the second place, I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that the bonus ought to be paid out of taxes wrung from the people in the now distressed business condition of the country, a condition which I believe will continue, more or less, for the next year or two. I believed then, and I believe now, that the bonus ought to be paid out of the interest on the debt due us by foreign countries. I had said so on previous occasions in committee.

Shortly after that bill was recommitted I received a letter from a distinguished soldier in my State—a man who had long been connected with the military establishment of my State, who went overseas—in which he asked me the question whether my vote to recommit the bill meant that I intended to vote against the bonus. I answered him in a letter dated the 3d day of August, 1921, of which I am going to put into the RECORD so much as relates to this subject. The part of the letter which I shall read is as follows:

MY DEAR COLONEL: I am in receipt of your courteous letter expressing the hope that my recent vote to recommit the soldiers' bonus bill did not indicate a purpose on my part to vote against soldiers' adjusted pay legislation.

In answer I take pleasure in assuring you it did not. I voted to recommit the bill because President Harding and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, who are primarily responsible for financing reconstruction, had each expressed in the most emphatic terms to Congress their unqualified opinion that the proposed bonus bill if enacted into law at this time would seriously embarrass the Treasury in its financial operations, and because my information and experience, acquired as chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate during the World War and as ranking minority member of that committee since March, 1919, strongly corroborated and confirmed their statements in this behalf.

For these reasons I have felt impelled to acquiesce in the suggestion and insistence made by the President and the Secretary that this legislation should be held in abeyance for the immediate present. I assume that the considerable number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, Senators who are known to be friendly to the soldiers' adjusted pay legislation, and who voted to recommit the bill, did so for substantially the same reasons that moved me so to vote. * * *

It is to be hoped that the debt due us by foreign Governments will soon be funded and most of the upward of $10,000,000,000 involved in those obligations put upon an interest paying basis. When this is done this interest will probably take care of the cash payments which the bill spreads over two years.

The hope has been expressed by a number of Senators that the large sum which will become available following the funding of the foreign debts due us might make it feasible for the Government to exercise greater liberality, especially toward those ex-service men who saw service overseas.

There is more in the letter on that line, which I shall not read for the lack of time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will now take my 10 minutes upon the bill if that be permissible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is another part of this letter which I shall not read, but shall put into the RECORD, which I think will completely answer any charge that in occupying a position which I do to-day I am playing any politics.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to insert in the RECORD the portion of the letter desired is granted.

The full text of the letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 3, 1921.

MY DEAR COLONEL: I am in receipt of your courteous letter expressing the hope that my recent vote to recommit the soldier's bonus bill did not indicate a purpose on my part to vote against soldiers' adjusted pay legislation.

In answering, I take pleasure in assuring you it did not. I voted to recommit the bill because President Harding and Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, who are primarily responsible for financing reconstruction, had each expressed in the most emphatic terms to Congress the unqualified opinion that the proposed bonus bill if enacted into law at this time would seriously embarrass the Treasury in its financial operations, and because my information and experience acquired as chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate during the World War and as ranking minority member of that committee since March, 1919, strongly corroborated and confirmed their statements in this behalf. For these reasons I felt impelled to acquiesce in the suggestion and insistence made by the President and the Secretary that this legislation should be held in abeyance for the immediate present. I assume that the considerable number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, Senators who are known to be friendly to soldiers' adjusted pay legislation and who voted to recommit the bill, did so for substantially the same reason that moved me so to vote.

In passing, I might say that the bill then pending for adjusted compensation and which I voted to recommit is not, in my judgment, a well-balanced bill in that it discriminates unjustly against those who most need present assistance and in favor of those who are more favorably situated. It seems to me unjust that the ex-service man whose pressing wants compel him to take cash should receive less than his better situated comrade who can by waiting two years under the borrowing provisions of the adjusted certificate plan draw in cash nearly 40 per cent more than the adjusted cash payment and still have his 20-year paid-up policy, less the amount borrowed. If there is to be a discrimination, it seems to me that it should be in favor of the weak rather than in favor of the strong.

It is hoped that the debts due us by foreign Governments will soon be funded and most of the upward of $10,000,000,000 involved in those obligations put upon an interest-paying basis. When this is done this interest will probably take care of the cash payment which the bill spreads over two years. At the end of those two years the borrowings authorized under the adjusted certificate plan will begin and this interest will be available and probably sufficient to cover the amount which the Government would for a few years have to advance on this account.

The bill has been sent back to the committee, and it is hoped that the compensation of those whose necessities compel them to ask cash and those able to wait a relatively short time will be more nearly balanced and equalized, and if there must of necessity be inequality or discrimination the measure may be so redrafted as to give the advantage to those who need it most.

The hope has been expressed by a number of Senators that the large sums which will become available following this funding of the foreign debts due us might make it feasible for the Government to exercise greater liberality, especially toward those ex-service men who saw service overseas, and without reducing the amount given those who remained at home allow a greater differential than 25 cents a day in favor of those who endured the hardships, privations, and dangers of actual participation in war.

I am confident the bill will, without any great delay, be reported back with amendments and betterments and put upon its passage under financial conditions which will enable those who wish to support it to do so without feeling that they are perpetrating an apparently unjustifiable discrimination between two groups of ex-service men on the one hand and on the other hand embarrassing the administration in dealing with the financial situation, the perplexities of which at the present time are staggering and which if not wisely and courageously met may lead to a disastrous financial debacle. President Harding, himself a friend of just and timely legislation for our ex-service men, would not, I am sure, have made the appeal he did for postponement if he had not felt that the situation imperatively demanded it. Responsibilities such as his will not permit the settlement of questions gravely affecting the exigencies of a critical public situation upon the basis of a personal desire. I myself keenly felt the force of this when, as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, during the war and during the first year thereafter I bore the chief responsibility in the Senate for devising, formulating, and piloting through that body legislation to raise the stupendous budgets required to finance that greatest of all military undertakings.

We were then confronted with the task of financing ourselves and allies in fighting a world war. We are now confronted with the scarcely less difficult task of financing our own reconstruction and aiding in the rehabilitation in the interest of humanity and our own safety and well-being of a world struggling against the forces of disorganization, anarchy, and bankruptcy.

I wish, my dear Colonel, especially to express to you my appreciation of the assurances you convey to me in your letter that, speaking out of long acquaintance with me, you know my final action with reference to the legislation in question would reflect my conscientious convictions. In all frankness I would rather my constituents and countrymen would think thus of my public acts than for them always to approve those acts.

I also wish to thank you for sending me a copy of your letter to the Hon. Hallet S. Ward, giving your reasons in favor of the legislation in question. Your statement has greatly impressed me, and I wish to say to you in all sincerity that no one has in my judgment, and in my judgment no one will be able to state the case of the ex-service man more forcefully and persuasively than you have done in your letter to Mr. Ward.

With assurances of cordial agreement with you with respect to the great claims upon their Government of the men whose gallantry contributed so decisively to the winning of the war and my wish to go as far as my sympathetic judgment will permit me to go in legislative recognition of their claims, I am,

Yours, very sincerely,

F. M. SIMMONS.

Hon. WILEY C. RODMAN,
Washington, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I know that it is said that the adjusted compensation bill will come back. At the time I voted to recommit I did not question that; nor do I question it now. I do not believe, as some Senators on this side of the Chamber have said they believe, that the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill has been buried and will not be resurrected. I think it will be resurrected; I think that both political parties in the country are for that measure, and, if they were not for it, public sentiment sooner or later would force them to be. But, Mr. President, I do not believe there is any purpose upon the part of the majority party in this body to enact such legislation as would enable the soldier to get his money as quickly as he would get it if the amendment to the bill proposed by me were adopted. What the soldier is demanding now is speed. I believe he has reached a firm conviction that he is going to get his money some day or other, but he needs it now; he needs it now probably worse than he ever will need it. He can not get it immediately under any scheme; he can not get it immediately, but we can expedite the time of its payment.

Mr. President, it will not do for Senators on the other side to say that we are going to raise this money by taxation. They have no such purpose, in my judgment. I think the President of the United States indicated in his address at the time the bill was recommitted that he had in mind the very scheme that I propose in my amendment, to pay the money by the application for that purpose of the interest upon indebtedness due us by foreign Governments.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who originally reported the soldiers' compensation bill to the Senate and who framed it, for it was turned over to him by the committee, and with reference to it he is really the acting chairman, in his speeches made on Saturday last and to-day indicated that it was his idea that it should be paid in this way.

I have heard no suggestion to the contrary recently. I had supposed that probably this would be the ultimate scheme until some suggestion was made in the discussion here a day or so since that the money to meet the payment of adjusted compensation should be provided by a sales tax. I know, as all Senators should know, the majority are not going to raise this money by taxation; why, because if they intended to do it by taxation why did they not provide for it in the pending bill?

Why did they not provide in this bill for raising by taxation a sufficient amount to meet the cash payment, if they intended to meet it in that way?

This bill certainly covers the fiscal years 1922 and 1923, and there is not a line in it to indicate any intention to raise money for this purpose; so that if we search the revenue bill which is about to be adopted for a provision to raise money to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation, we will see that there is no purpose on the part of the Republican majority to pay the soldier anything out of the taxes collected during the year 1922 and the year 1923.

Now the suggestion to meet this obligation by the imposition of a sales tax is made. Mr. President, to my mind, that is absurd. There was a powerful element in the country that wanted a sales tax; they wanted to be taxed upon everything they sold, but they were not asking for a tax upon themselves without getting a consideration which they thought was full and complete; they were willing to have a sales tax which they could pass on to the consumer, but only upon condition that they should be relieved of certain other taxes they knew would otherwise be imposed upon them. That was the condition. But if the proposition is a sales tax to raise additional money for the soldier, if the proposition is to impose a tax on the manufacturers of the United States, or the profiteers, solely for the purpose of raising additional money for the payment of soldiers' bonus, not many manufacturers or business men will be found to support any such proposition.

Senator, we know and the country knows that the Republican Party represents and stands for policies favored by big business, and it is not going to voluntarily pass legislation not satisfactory to those interests. You will never pay the soldiers' bonus with a sales tax. The only way that you will ever pay it is in the way proposed by this amendment. It is a logical way to meet this obligation. It is the wise way under present conditions in which to do it. We can pay the bonus out of the interest on our indebtedness of foreign Governments to us without embarrassing, without handicapping, without throwing a clog in the wheel of the business of the United States, and without taking one dollar out of the taxes paid by any citizen or taxpayer. It would be paying it out of a fund that was contributed by all the people, rich and poor alike. There is the widow's mite in that fund; there is a pauper's begged penny in that fund; there are the earnings of the sweat of the face in that fund, as well as the earnings of big business and the profiteer. It is the proper fund to appropriate and to consecrate, so far as it is necessary, for this holy purpose. It was the money that paid the expenses of our allies and enabled them to fight those great battles that saved civilization until we came and joined our invincible hosts to theirs and won the final victory. It is a sacred fund.

Mr. President, I hope that this amendment will be adopted. It is what I believe both parties wish with reference to this matter; and if you can put an amendment on this bill that will accomplish a purpose that both parties seem to have, and in the credit for which both parties will probably participate when it is consummated, why, in the name of Heaven, should you not do it quickly to-day, instead of six months hence?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from North Carolina entirely that when the President asked that the bill go back to the committee for the purpose of delay he had in mind the settlement of our foreign debts and the use of the interest arising therefrom to apply upon the soldiers' compensation bill. Immediately there was introduced into both branches of Congress a bill to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to bring about an adjustment of the debts and their interest—an adjustment that could be made at the present time, an adjustment which would require the action of all of the countries interested. That has been delayed and delayed and delayed. It ought to have passed two months ago. If we pass it now we can still utilize that interest; but if we fail to pass it, then if we pass the soldiers' compensation bill we shall have to look for other means of taxation.

It is for that reason that I urge as earnestly as possible speedy action upon this settlement proposition; and if we get it it will not be necessary to raise a penny more by taxation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no desire to delay the Senate by entering into any elaborate discussion of the question involved in this amendment. I desire merely to say that whenever we pay the bonus, as we undoubtedly shall, I want the payment to be a real payment. I want the soldiers to get the money, and the money should be provided. This proposition is simply under pretense of giving them a bonus—to give them an uncertainty, an indefinite note of hand. No one can tell when we shall get either the principal or the interest on those great foreign credits which we issued. We can not collect them by force. We are not going to war in order to collect those credits. Therefore we must collect them by some arrangement made in the best way we can make it, through the legislation which, I hope, will be speedily passed; but the time of payment of those credits is necessarily indefinite. We may get some money very speedily in the way of interest. We shall not begin to get the total interest on the fund; and to promise, under guise of giving the soldiers the bonus, that they shall have that money from the foreign loans is practically giving them nothing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment provides that if the amount of interest received from the foreign debts to us is not sufficient, the Secretary of the Treasury may issue certificates of indebtedness to make up the deficiency, to be paid out of the next installment. If the Senator will pardon me further, the Senator from North Dakota estimates that the cash payments will amount to about $200,000,000 a year. Whether we collect all of that interest in any one year or not, it would certainly be sufficient to pay that. The full amount of it would be about $600,000,000.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I return to my objection: If we are to arrange to pay the bonus, let it be arranged so that it will be paid whenever we promise to pay it, out of the Treasury of the United States, so that the soldiers will get real money, for which we are responsible, and not, as I said before, an indefinite note of hand, based on the uncertain return from the credits which we hope to collect, and which it will probably take a long series of years to secure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, which must necessarily be limited, to address myself to the amendment before the Senate, and to make a few observations touching matters which are connected with and involved in its immediate consideration.

I venture to recall to Senators that when the bonus bill came into this body, and a motion was made to recommit it, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] offered an amendment to that motion, which will be found in the RECORD in the edition of July 15. The motion to recommit was doubtless made and I think carried very largely because of the cogent reasons presented here, earnestly and patriotically, by the President of our country. Those reasons convinced the learned Senator [Mr. SIMMONS] who has just addressed us, and they convinced others, many of whom then as now were in favor of the measure; though, lest I forget, I hasten to add that I thought then and I think now that the so-called bonus bill can be materially improved, made more acceptable to those for whose benefit it is designed, and more acceptable to the thoughtful minds of Senators. At any rate, the motion was made to recommit; and, because of his devotion to the purpose of the bill, the good Senator from Iowa offered an amendment to the effect that the committee should be instructed to return the bill into this body within a definite time—on or before January 1, 1922—all to the end that it might be again taken up, considered, improved, it may be, and transmuted into law.

The amendment of the Senator was in these words, as stated from the desk:

> The Senator from Iowa moves to amend the motion by adding:
> "And that the Committee on Finance is instructed to report on or before the first Monday in January, 1922, a new adjusted compensation bill."

I am not very familiar with parliamentary rules or methods of procedure here; but, favoring the bill and favoring the suggested amendment—which was, by way of instruction, respectfully given to the committee—along with six other Senators, I voted for the amendment, the purpose of which you now recall. Strangely enough to the far western mind, practically the whole Senate, Republican and Democrat, voted against that very amendment of the Senator from Iowa. The record is to be found at page 3874, and the names of the Senators voting are set down on that and the succeeding page. The upshot of the matter was that 7 of us voted thus to direct the committee, 69 Senators voted against that instruction, and 19 Members of the Senate were absent or did not vote.

I recall this, not to embarrass anybody, not to indulge by innuendo in criticism of anybody, but in order, if I may, to have it here and now set down that then I took the position which is here recorded.

And now we are brought to this hour, and we have before us a revenue measure, a measure of very great and far-reaching importance, important to every man and woman and child in the Republic, affecting as it does every State from Maine to California, from Florida to Washington, affecting every industry of our country. I know, if I know anything—and my knowledge is born of confidence and respect for the Members of this body—that every Senator is concerned in this bill for no other reason than that it shall make for the welfare of the Nation and the people thereof, not the rich nor the poor exclusively, but all the people of the Nation.

It is a revenue measure, and because it is such I do not think it wise to engraft upon it measures of the kind suggested by the amendment immediately before us. Nor do I think it wise to engraft upon it other amendments which may be offered, if they have for their object a departure from the main purpose of the revenue bill, the purpose of which was, is, and must continue to be the raising of adequate revenue to pay the legitimate expenses of our Government.

With deference I advance the thought, and by repetition would emphasize it, that we should keep before us the immediate purpose of the bill now pending, and not divert our minds by other matters, certainly not permit ourselves to get into controversies which develop a spirit which is more or less fatal to sound logic and to sound reasoning—collateral matters, important in and of themselves, to be hereafter taken up and considered, but not, in my judgment, now to be engrafted upon this immediate measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I now wish to speak on the bill itself, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California is recognized to speak on the bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. All the resources of lofty and loving eloquence have been exhausted in paying tribute to the soldiers and sailors of our Republic, and poetry has laid its immortal wreath upon the tomb of the dead and the brow of the living. No words of ours uttered in this Chamber can tell what love we have for the dead, nor can we add to the pure glory of the living. The one is unspeakable, the other is as fadeless as the stars.

We owe a great duty to the soldiers and the sailors of this Republic, Mr. President. To the dead we owe the tribute of our tears. We owe a great and sacred duty to the dependent wife or children of the dead, and that duty a grateful nation must and shall perform.

To the living we owe a great and sacred duty; first, of course, to those who came back wounded, wrecked in body, perhaps in mind. That is a duty which this nation must and shall perform.

We owe a great and sacred duty also to those who providentially came back, not wounded, but who have suffered loss of time, in a material sense suffering. Wherefore I am in favor of this kind of legislation, unreservedly, without hesitation, and certainly without any desire to exalt myself or to flatter myself that my love, my devotion, my sense of gratitude, is deeper or profounder than that of any other Member of this body, or of anyone else, humble or great, in this land. We owe this duty to the living; we must and we shall perform it in all good time.

The war was not fought by partisans—by the Democrats of North Carolina, nor by the Republicans of California. It was not fought by Republicans or by Democrats. The sons of the Republic—they came, Mr. President, from your State, the great State of Washington (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). They came from Idaho, they came from every State, gladly, proudly, singing, to fight, to suffer, and to die for their flag—for your flag and for my flag—and, if it were possible, they added a new luster to that flag.

They returned, not as Republicans, not as Democrats; they returned as Americans, lifting high the flag which has never known defeat, holding it up in the sky that loves it. They returned, and as soldiers and sailors they are, not Republicans, not Democrats, but proud, upstanding, patriotic Americans. They came from Alabama, too, the Democrats and the Republicans; and my eloquent friend who sits here [Mr. HEFLIN] will pardon me if I tell him now that he must not impute to one of my name the voting for any measure at the behest or command of others, for if he will read the judicial history of Alabama he will see my name there, and the blood of my kindred was there.

Mr. HEFLIN. And a good man he was, too.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So, Mr. President, for reasons so logically presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], reasons presented without passion, obviously without any desire to make political capital, for the reasons which he has presented and others which I think might be added, I can not bring myself to believe that now is the time to adopt this or other similar amendments to the revenue measure. In good time a bill, the one in committee, will be reported out. It is not, in my judgment, a perfect bill. I think it can be improved. I think it will be improved, and I think, as now advised, that the moneys due us from European nations should be and will be made available and be devoted to the payments to be made under a bonus or an adjusted compensation bill to be enacted. In respect to that feature of the measure, I find myself in accord with many of the thoughts expressed by the Senator from South Carolina and by my learned friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I am from North Carolina?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. It has been such a long time between invitations by the governor of one of those States to the governor of the other that I sometimes get a little bit confused.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not aware that the Senator from California had extended me an invitation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I hope to have that pleasure after the adjournment.

Mr. President, I find myself in accord with the thoughts expressed by these two Senators, thoughts which I entertained, if I may say so, many, many months ago, that the debts due us by foreign nations should be paid, and that the interest, now aggregating, I think, over $1,000,000,000 should be the more speedily paid, and that it might well be devoted to meeting the requirements of a so-called bonus bill.

I pause to say that I do not like the term "bonus," nor do I like the phrase "adjusted compensation." It suggests the idea of an account stated, of a debt incurred and paid; for permit me to say that we never shall be able to pay this debt. When these young men are old and feeble, as most of the veterans of the Civil War are, this nation will continue to owe them much and will continue to assist them, and as they walk down into the shadows of the evening of life will aid them, will comfort them, will vote vast sums of money to them and to their dependents. So that this is neither a "bonus" bill nor is it an "adjusted compensation" bill, but it is a proposed measure of recognition and of reward and of inadequate compensation for invaluable services rendered the Republic.

Mr. President, I respectfully suggest to thoughtful Senators that we should not delay the passage of this revenue measure. We should dispose of these amendments which seek to tack on to it matters in a sense not germane, matters which are foreign to the main purpose, and then we should unitedly bring about an adjustment of the foreign debts; we should cooperate to that end, and there should be no political discussion on that proposition. Men may differ as to the ways and means, or the amount of pressure we should bring to bear, but we should cooperate toward speeding a funding or refunding of the payment of moneys admittedly due us, and then cooperate, without regard to partisanship, above all partisanship, in the framing and early enactment of a measure called the bonus or adjusted compensation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I thank the Senators for their attention.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I regret that I have not been able to enthuse over this bonus propaganda. To me, as an old soldier of the Civil War, there has been something repellant in the agitation which has been carried on by some of the posts of the American Legion—not all of them—for this bonus.

Over half of the soldiers in the Army during the late war never went out of the country. They lived here in fine barracks, had good cooking, good food, slept on cots, and suffered no hardship beyond drilling and standing guard. They had war risk insurance, they had family allowances, they had the advantages of the Young Men's Christian Association, the Salvation Army, and the Knights of Columbus.

When I compare the experience of these men with that of the soldiers of the Civil War, and the pay they got, it seems to me remarkable that the men who are now agitating for this bonus can take the stand they do. During the first few months of the Civil War the pay of the American soldier was about $11 a month. Afterwards it was increased to $13 a month, and finally to the maximum of $16 a month; but at that time gold was at a premium of from $2.30 to $2.40, and the soldiers of those days were paid in the depreciated paper currency. The maximum pay they got in those days, as I said, was $16 a month.

What did they get in the late war? The lowest pay any private got was $30 a month, and if he was a married man, if he had a wife or children or dependent parents, he got a family allowance in addition to his regular pay. Besides he got a bonus of $60 when discharged, something not accorded to the soldier of the Civil War.

In the matter of food, we had no bacon, we had no ham in the days of the Civil War. We got salt pork in the barrel in brine, and we got salt beef of the same kind. The only other meat that we got was when we were in localities where we could round up some cattle and kill them and get a little fresh beef in that way. The only vegetables that we had were rice and beans. We had no canned goods. There was one thing we had which was a great curse to the soldier. We had the Army sutlers, from whom we had to buy our supplies in the way of the little extras we wanted or needed, a little tobacco, a little candy, and other little knickknacks, on which there was three or four hundred per cent profit.

Did those veterans of the Civil War, when they came back home, set up a clamor for an enormous bounty like these soldiers are doing? No. When they came back home from the war they proved themselves to be a balance wheel in the life of the Republic, and they did their share without seeking for an enormous bonus when the country was overloaded with debt.

Aside from pensions, which were only given to those who were disabled, there was nothing akin to this in the days following the Civil War until nearly 30 years after that war was over, when the act of 1890 was passed. Prior to that it was simply a question of pensions to the soldiers who had been disabled and to the widows of those soldiers who had died in the service. In 1890 there was some legislation enacted in the shape of more liberal pensions. In the latter part of the war the Government paid a larger bounty for enlistments than in the early part of the war. Acts were passed to equalize these bounties for those who enlisted in the early part of the war, to whom no bounty had been paid, and to others who enlisted a little later in the war to whom a small bounty had been paid in order to equalize that matter. But beyond that there was nothing done in the shape that is now asked by the soldiers of the American Legion.

Then consider the poor Confederate soldiers. They came home to a devastated country. They got no relief whatever. To be sure, their States in time passed laws providing for the crippled and disabled veterans, but beyond that none of those who were Confederate soldiers got any help.

The Northern soldiers, when we came marching home again, were content to cooperate with our fellow citizens in building up the country and we did not ask for an enormous bonus.

Mr. President, those veterans who went over to France and were disabled should be taken care of. I am as anxious as anybody can be to do justice to them and to do it in every way possible. Then, too, if we could segregate them I should be very glad if we could do something for the soldiers who actually did fighting over there, who participated in the battles on the St. Mihiel salient, who participated in the campaign around Chateau-Thierry and in the great final drive in bottling up the Germans in the Argonne. My heart goes out to those fighting soldiers, but I declare my heart can not go out to the 2,000,000 soldiers who stayed here in America in comfortable, pleasant barracks and had nothing more to do than a little drilling and to stand camp guard.

I wish to say another thing to my very good friend from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who has pending an amendment proposing, as I understand it, to use the money received from our foreign loans or the interest on them to pay the proposed bonus. Senators talk about these foreign loans as though they were something horrible. I wish to tell the Senator from North Carolina something about those foreign loans.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator let me correct him? The Senator said my amendment gave the interest——

Mr. NELSON. I understood that the Senator proposes to give the proceeds of the foreign loans to these soldiers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all. It only appropriates annually enough to meet the payments provided in the bill which was reported to the Senate and recommitted.

Mr. NELSON. In the first place, I wish to get the Senator from North Carolina back on terra firma. If the Senator will examine the records as I have, he will find that the larger part of these loans were made after the armistice. The moneys were advanced to Governments in Europe, both the old and the newly established, to enable them to purchase supplies to keep them from starving, and most of the proceeds of those loans were devoted to buying American products. Most of the money was spent in this country to buy American products for those poor countries in Europe, old and new, to keep them alive. The result was that we got the benefit from it indirectly for the farmers of the country by getting better prices for our products in 1918, 1919, and 1920. The money was largely devoted to that purpose.

The loans were made on short-time securities, on all kinds of bonds and certificates. Some of the Governments were regularly organized Governments, long established, like France, Italy, and England. Others were new Governments in embryo, which had just been established. The most we could say of some of them was that they were de facto governments, and the Government of the United States advanced money to them. It so happened that some of the Balkan States were in the greatest danger of starving and needed the most help. The Government advanced money and took such securities as they could obtain from those Governments or the organizations that were passing as governments.

The practical way to do with our foreign loans is to fund them and get them into some regular form of bonds against those Governments which have now been established and thus put them in proper form. We all know what the conditions are in Europe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. However, he has 10 minutes on the bill if he desires to use that time.

Mr. NELSON. I shall take 10 minutes on the bill.

We all know what are the conditions in Europe. Europe is not able to pay us at the present time. When Europe gets rehabilitated in time, those Governments will be able to pay us. What we ought to do now is to get the loans that were made to the de facto governments and de jure governments in such a condition that they will be tangible and can be handled and will give us an income in the future.

I have listened to some Senators who have been talking wildly and saying why not make them pay the interest. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said, we can not collect that interest from those people except through voluntary means. We can not go to war about it. We can not send a sheriff to collect it by an execution as we would collect a judgment. We have to negotiate the matter. The first process will be to put those loans, regular and irregular, into some tangible permanent shape, and refund them, so that in time we can collect the interest, and whatever we get out of it we will need to pay the interest on our own foreign debts which we ourselves owe.

Coming back now to the soldiers——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator unless he is willing that I should do so.

Mr. NELSON. I have so little time that I will ask the Senator to pardon me if I do not yield. Otherwise I would be very glad to yield to my good friend from North Carolina.

Coming back to the bonus bill, I have had letters from a great many of the soldiers who served in the war who look at this question as I do. They feel that it is inopportune at this time at all events or in the near future to ask for any bonus. They feel that the country in its present condition is not able to pay such a bonus. More than that they have the patriotic spirit which ought to possess every American citizen. They feel that it is the duty of every American to serve his country in time of war, and that he should not serve it for money; that he should not serve it as a mercenary, but should serve it through a pure patriotic spirit, from pure patriotic principles. Those are the sentiments which possess many of the soldiers of the recent war. Some of their leaders are playing politics, passing resolutions in conventions which they are holding, and then the politicians get hold of them. They think it is a great fortune to make these soldiers believe, "Oh, we Democrats are your friends. These blasted Republicans do not care a continental for you. We will vote for you and your bonus. We will vote to have the excess profits put into your hopper; we will vote to have the foreign loans put into your hopper; we will do everything under the sun for you boys who were mustered into the Army during the war."

I have faith enough in the major part of the American soldiers who were in our grand Army during the war to believe that in their innermost hearts they despise being made the football of politics, and in the end some of the politicians who are now clamoring for the bonus will find that the soldiers will not thank them for their efforts. They will feel, as we veterans of the Civil War felt, that it was their duty to serve the country without money and without price, as a matter of principle and as a matter of patriotism. I believe, if anything is to be accorded to them in addition to what they received during the war in the way of salary and insurance and allowances, they are willing to wait and bide their time until the country gets in an easy condition, when the Government can afford to do something for them, as it did for the veterans of the Civil War 30 years after that war was over.

Mr. President, as an old soldier I can not help expressing my sentiments on this question. I believe that a great majority of the soldiers of the recent war feel about the matter as I do, and the politicians will find to their sorrow that they have made a mistake in assuming that the soldiers can be bunkoed and fooled by this bonus question, by proposing to assign to it the excess-profits taxes, by proposing to assign to it our foreign loans and everything else under the sun for the purpose of making the soldier boys believe that the politicians are their friends.

Mr. President, I have been greatly disappointed. When the veterans of the Civil War returned to their homes they took up the burdens of civil life among their fellow citizens and proved themselves to be industrious, law-abiding citizens and a balance wheel in the life of the Republic. It could be said of them, as was said of the soldiers of Oliver Cromwell. After the Stuarts came into power and it became necessary to disband the old Cromwellian army, the Stuarts and their followers felt that that army of veterans would be a danger in the community after they were disbanded; that they would be a menace to society. But the historian Macaulay states, and states truly, that they were mistaken. They found as they passed through the different parts of England in the little villages and towns that where there was an industrious tinker, an industrious blacksmith, an industrious carpenter, where they found thrifty and industrious men any place, they were generally some of Oliver Cromwell's old soldiers. So following the close of the Civil War, both in the North and in the South, when an industrious, thrifty, and prosperous man stood out prominently amongst his fellows it was generally true that he was one of the old soldiers who had fought in that war, either as a defender of the Stars and Stripes or as a follower of the Stars and Bars. Such a man was not found to be clamoring for a bonus as are soldiers of the World War to-day. Two millions of those soldiers never left the country; they lived in their barracks in glorious peace, surrounded with many of the facilities of a modern hotel. Give them a bonus! Why, Mr. President, to me it seems a most unreasonable claim, not creditable to the soldiers of the late war.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, it is very pertinent to inquire why this amendment providing for adjusted compensation for our war veterans should be considered in connection with this revenue bill. It seems to me the answer is very simple. We are undertaking for the first time since the close of the World War to readjust our finances; to find out what we owe; and to find out where and how we shall raise the money with which to pay our debts. When we are undertaking for the first time since the end of the war to formulate a program for taxing our people, if it is not pertinent now to ask the question, Do we owe any further compensation to our soldiers who won the war, when is it ever going to be pretinent?

Mr. President, the question is very fittingly presented here for discussion, because now, if ever, when we are shaping our financial policy for the future, we must consider the serious and great financial obligations that this measure of adjusted compensation involves. Not only is that a sound reason for considering the question, but, to quote the words of the Finance Committee itself, they state that the payment of an adjusted compensation to our soldiers is a just and an unquestioned moral and financial obligation of this Nation. If that is so, when are we to discuss "a just and unquestioned moral obligation," and how to meet it, if not when we are seeking to levy and distribute the burdens of our Government through taxation?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], in a very brilliant speech on Saturday night last, undertook to call to task the slowness with which certain Democratic States had responded to the wishes and desires of the soldiers for compensation and relief. He inadvertently forgot that he was placing the Democratic States of this country in very good company, because if the Democratic States have been derelict in having failed to provide a bonus for our soldiers they are in the company of the Republican national administration, which has up to date failed to provide such a bonus. Their answer an be the answer that comes from the other side of the Chamber—"In good time"; "wait"; "our financial obligations will not permit it"; "our finances are not sufficiently strong to accept and undertake this burden at the present time."

Mr. President, this obligation, moral and financial, is based upon the theory that our soldiers who enlisted in defense of the country during the World War were put in the position of being denied all the economic gains and advantages which inured to those of the American people who remained at home, and that, when they returned from the war, they had equally to accept the economic burdens and losses that followed in the wake of the war. To argue in favor of adjusted compensation to our soldiers seems to me to be absolutely unnecessary. We have but to ask ourselves one question: Who of all the people in all America during the World War were paid the lowest and the meanest wage? The very men whom we called to the service and defense of our lives and our property were paid the poorest wage received by any Americans during the war. Not only that, but the incapacitated, the weak, of the very class and age of our soldiers who remained at home were rewarded with the highest wage ever paid to employees in America, and in many cases paid by the Government itself to the clerks who kept the records of those on the firing line. On what theory of justice can we defend a policy that gives a financial reward to those who serve at a desk in Washington because they are not physically fit to endure the hardship of battle?

We can not justify; we can not defend the policy that compels the defenders of a Nation to bear all the economic losses as well as all the dangers and hardships of war. It is absolutely indefensible. It might have been acceptable in the days that have gone by, when kings and emperors could demand their subjects to go to war and battle for them at whatever price they fixed; but in this enlightened age and under democratic institutions the soldiers who defend a Government from complete catastrophe do not propose, in addition to their heroic service, to permit those who remained at home to revel in the economic gains which come in times of war from the unusual prosperity which follows in its train. Democracy and democratic institutions no longer will permit or tolerate that the soldiers, the defenders of the Government, shall bear all the hardships and all the dangers and as well the financial losses and economic burdens that grow out of wars.

Ah, the people of the world are making progress in the assertion of these rights in these days. When we ask men to fight for democracy we must do and practice equality, and that is doing democracy. We can not say to these men, "Your reward is the spiritual reward that you have done a great service." Spiritual reward is personal; the consciousness of having done a great deed, a noble work, comes to a man himself; no nation gives it to him; no vote of Congress gives him that spiritual reward; it is the consciousness that is his own and that comes from the knowledge of having done his duty conscientiously and faithfully and having served his country unstintingly in a great and noble cause.

Let a man jump into the water and save your drowning child—a great and noble deed. Sickness follows; he falls a victim to disease. Is your obligation completed with paying the doctor's bills, with nursing and restoring to health the man whose heroism saved the life of one dear and near to you? Have you not also an economic obligation, that of giving to that man every dollar which he has lost during the period when he served you and during the period that he suffered in consequence of his heroic act? You are bound in honor to restore him to his former economic status as far as your means allow it.

I, for one, Mr. President, propose to discuss and agitate and urge our Government to cancel the economic debt it owes to its soldiers without delay. I say it is the business of a grateful people and a generous Government after a war is over and ended victoriously to bind up the wounds of the bleeding, to bury the dead, to restore to health those who are incapacitated, and to make an earnest effort to pay the economic losses of those who served them and defended their homes and their country.

Three measures are suggested here by which——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then I will take the 10 minutes allotted to me on the bill, Mr. President.

Three ways, as I started to say, are suggested here by which we can meet this obligation: First, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] says, "Now that we are readjusting our financial program; now that the war is over and we are finding out what our debts are and what our revenues are to be, stop," he says, "and do not take this tax off the profit-making corporations; do not take the excess-profits tax off, but retain it and apply the proceeds to the payment of this debt which we owe our soldiers." That proposal has been voted on; it has been rejected; it is dead apparently forever; and there is no hope of a soldiers' compensation ever coming out of that source until at least political conditions change, for the majority party has repudiated this method of raising revenues.

What is the next proposition? A sales tax. It is ridiculous. Any serious-minded man who is familiar with the influences in American politics knows that a sales tax will never pass this Congress for this purpose, and I will state the reason why. Who is behind the sales-tax movement? Who is clamoring and asking for a sales tax in Congress and outside of Congress? The big business interests of this country. They are the propagandists who are asking for it, and these big business interests of this country are the bitterest opponents of the soldiers' bonus. Why does big business want a sales tax? They want a sales tax as a substitute for what they allege are the present burdensome taxes on business, but no one is so foolish as to think or contend that the business men have been pleading with us for a sales tax merely that another tax could be placed upon them; they have been demanding such a tax as a substitute tax for what they consider a much more burdensome system of taxation; and yet the majority party say that by and by they will ask these business men not to take a sales tax as a substitute for other burdensome taxes, but as another tax in addition to those which they already bear, in order to compensate our war veterans.

Mr. President, it is to laugh; it is ridiculous. The same pressure, the same influences that have been exerted here in behalf of a sales tax, will be exerted with tremendous force against this proposition of linking this so-called bonus debt with the sales tax.

The business interests, the big business interests—not all the business interests are lacking in unselfish appreciation and gratitude—are powerful. Their power and influence kept this soldiers' compensation proposition out of the national platform of the Republican convention of a year ago, and I fear they kept it out of the Democratic platform of a year ago.

I must give you credit for some political sagacity over there. Whether you like the bonus or not, you at least have vision. You at least appreciate that the American people favor it. You will pass a bonus act I have little doubt when the next national election approaches. You will do it not because you believe in the proposition, but you will do it to corral for the Republican Party the influence and votes of 4,000,000 soldiers and their millions of friends for the next 50 years. A babe in politics could have known and would have known two years ago that just as surely as the sun shines our soldiers will have their miserable, inadequate pay adjusted, because it is so apparent that those who served us in the Army and Navy lost economically every day that they remained in the service of our country, because it is the determined purpose of the American people to remove the injustice and economic inequalities we compelled our defenders to bear in addition to their military service. Public opinion will demand you act before you go to the country again, and Senators on this side intend to give that public opinion expression and direction until you do act.

Tell me what debt is more binding on man or Government than the debt of wage, than compensation? One of the sins that cry to heaven for vengeance is the denial of a just and honest wage to the man who labors for and serves you.

What is the third plan suggested by which to meet this obligation? I pass from the sales-tax proposition. Mark my words: The sales tax never will be accepted. Business interests will plainly tell you and you will agree, "In the beginning of the new era of prosperity, after the depression we have passed through, we can not afford the burden of another tax to meet this compensation."

What is this third plan? It is the source suggested by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]—an amendment which I joined him in proposing to the Senate. It is, very briefly stated, the application of the interest money which we receive from our foreign loans to pay this compensation. I am not one of those in this body who think that this interest is never going to be paid. I say, and I have the opinion of a Secretary of the Treasury to confirm me, that there is not the slightest doubt but that France and Great Britain will begin the payment of their interest after the two-year period has expired when they were immune or claimed to be immune by consent of the former administration from the paying of this interest, and that two-year period expires in a few months. Next year the interest on a large part of these debts is to be paid. It is an untouched fund. If this money goes to meet current expenditures, it is lost forever to the soldiers, because once it is applied to the current expenses of this Government we shall have to explain to the people why we are raising their taxes, as we would have to do if we should then try to pass a soldiers' compensation bill through this body.

Mr. SIMMONS. And we would have to pass another revenue bill to raise the money.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly; and we would have to pass another revenue bill. This interest is to be paid. It is going to be paid next year. This amendment proposes that we assume this obligation next year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can not yield to the Senator; I am sorry. I have only two or three minutes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Only for a question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This amendment proposes that both the interest upon this obligation and our debt to our soldiers shall go hand in hand, and one shall balance the other. Will it meet the obligation? Only in three years until the year of maturity twenty years later—mark my words—will the amount that the Treasury will have to appropriate be in excess of $50,000,000, under the plan that the Secretary of the Treasury and the Senator from North Dakota believe will be the plan accepted by the soldiers—less than $50,000,000 in all but three years. This money will be paid if for no other reason than pride. Great Britain and France will not allow Americans and the people of the world to throw in their faces their refusal to pay the interest upon this debt. It will be paid without question; and incidentally the adoption of this amendment will be notice to them that the payment of the interest will be acceptable.

I am not in favor of pressing them unduly. I am not in favor of making the payment even of this interest burdensome to them. I am not in favor of playing the rôle of hounding our debtors. They were our allies. They fought side by side with us. We ought to ask for the payment of this interest as we would press a friendly debtor in our personal relations with a fellow man, and in no other way and in no other manner. It will be notice to them that the payment of the interest will be acceptable, and that we propose to appropriate it to meet a very sacred and a very holy and a very great obligation; and how appropriate it will be also, because the money that was loaned to these allies, that will now bring us interest, came from whom? From the soldiers themselves; from all our people, including the mites of the widow and the poor.

Mr. President, do our soldiers need this additional compensation? Before one of the committees of which I have the honor to be a member a few days ago an officer of the United States Army stated to us that they had to withdraw from soldiers their applications for Liberty loan bonds, because the allotment which they had given to their families at home and the allotment necessary to pay their insurance was more than the amount of the monthly wage due them. Because, Mr. President, they were penniless and had not the funds to meet any other obligations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be adopted, and that we can once for all settle and adjudicate this question by notice to our soldiers and to the country that we propose to use this fund for this purpose.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I had not thought to occupy any of the time upon this amendment; but an observation just made by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] seems to me of such a character that it ought to receive a moment's attention.

I understood the Senator to say—not quoting his language, but this is the substance of it—that he should agitate continually in favor of the cancellation of this debt, meaning by that the debt which we owe the soldiers. I understood that to be his statement, or the substance of it. I may have misunderstood the Senator—I certainly do not desire to misquote or misrepresent him.

Mr. President, that is not at all my concept of this situation. That is a debt which can not be canceled. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to suggest that by the payment of the $350 or $400 contemplated in this legislation we shall be able to cancel the debt that we owe the soldiers? In my own State to-morrow we shall vote for a State adjusted compensation law that will involve an expenditure of somewhere between thirty and forty million dollars for the benefit of Ohio's ex-service men. My vote has already been cast by absent voter's ballot in favor of that legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think the Senator means to misquote me. I thought I said, certainly I intended to say, that the payment of this adjusted compensation would cancel in part the debt resulting from the economic losses which our soldiers suffered during the time they were serving and defending the country. The debt I discussed had no relation whatever to the debt of gratitude which every grateful citizen owes to our soldiers and which can never be compensated for.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, it seems to me that proposition is wider of the mark than the other. Men went into the Army who were earning $2,000 and $5,000, and some of them $10,000 a year. They gave up these incomes willingly and accepted $30 per month for a patriotic service while men of less earning power who stayed at home were paid $10 or $15 per day in war industries conducted under the extravagant "cost-plus" system. Does the Senator mean to say that by paying the little amount that is provided in this bill we are going to cancel that debt and equalize the soldiers' pay with the inflated wages paid at home? I think the Senator has absolutely the wrong concept of the relationship between the soldier and the Government.

As I was about to say when interrupted, we are voting in the State of Ohio to-morrow on the question of a soldiers' bonus. My vote will be in the ballot box in favor of that expenditure by the State of some thirty or forty million dollars. Did I put that vote into the box on the theory that by so doing I would be able to cancel the debt that we owed to the soldiers of Ohio? Why, of course not. That is not the idea of it. That is a debt that can not be paid; and when I vote, as I shall vote here very soon, in favor of a soldiers' bonus which will be written upon the statute books of this country, I shall vote not upon the theory that by so doing I am going to cancel any debt, because it is a debt that can not be canceled. Because of his patriotic service in the Nation's defense the soldier has suffered through the discrepancies in wages which I have pointed out, an economic loss. By adjusted compensation legislation the Nation endeavors to equalize in part this discrepancy and remedy this wrong.

Wages at home increased in some cases 500 or 600 per cent, but in the Army they did not so increase. Men should not be penalized economically for rendering patriotic service.

In that connection, since it has been referred to by numerous Senators in this debate, I wonder if it would not be interesting to see just what the President said upon this question when he addressed the Senate. I have taken the pains to read it. There is nothing in any statement made by the President of the United States that indicates that we are not to have legislation on the subject of a soldiers' bonus. I quote from his address delivered here in the Senate when I read the following sentence:

> In a personal as well as a public manner—

Some of us know exactly the matter to which reference is made in that sentence—

> In a personal as well as a public manner, which ought to be a plight of good faith, I have commended the policy of generous treatment of the Nation's defenders, not as a part of any contract—

The President of the United States very properly spurns the idea that by voting three or four hundred dollars to each soldier we are going to cancel a debt. Great heavens! What will Senators say, if they believe in that proposition, when a few years later pension bills are introduced here? And such legislation ought to come, and will come, and ought to be supported. If Senators now say that they propose to cancel the debt and discharge the obligation owing the soldiers, on what theory will they base their votes when called upon to vote in favor of pension legislation? I shall vote in favor of that legislation, and the party to which I belong will favor it. It has written upon the statute books substantially all the pension legislation that we now have—incidentally, I may say, generally in the face of the opposition of Senators on the other side of the Chamber. So it is not a contract; but, proceeding with the reading, the President says:

> Not as a part of any contract, not as the payment of a debt which is owing, but as a mark of the Nation's gratitude. Every obligation is to the disabled and dependent. In such reference as has been made to general compensation there has been a reservation as to the earliest consistent time for such action if it is taken.

Then, on the next page of the document, I read:

> After a survey of more than four months, contemplating conditions which would stagger all of us were it not for our abiding faith in America—

I beg you to note this, Senators, particularly. He says:

> I am fully persuaded that three things are essential to the very beginning of the restored order of things. These are the revision, including reduction, of our internal taxation, the refunding of our war debt, and the adjustment of our foreign loans. It is vitally necessary to settle these problems before adding to our Treasury any such burden as is contemplated in the pending bill.

That was the position of the President. He did not say, he has never said, so far as I am aware, in public or private that he, or the party of which he is the leader, was opposed to the bonus proposition; and if he had so spoken, there are those in the party for whom he could not have properly spoken, because I say frankly that when the adjusted compensation legislation comes before the Senate in a proper way and in proper form, not as an amendment to a great revenue bill, I shall support it, as I have supported similar legislation in my own State. But it should not come before the Senate until the three problems the President has pointed out are either solved or are well under way toward solution.

Before I take my seat, Mr. President, I want to make another observation. There has been much discussion here to lead the public to believe that the party in power has been negligent, that but little has been done for the soldiers. When I recite some of the things which have been done, I do not wish to be understood as thinking or saying that all has been done which ought to be done; but it is not fair that Senators stand on the other side of the Chamber and hold out the idea that the soldier has not been properly provided for in the appropriation of funds.

I find, for example, from the report of the committee of which the distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is an honored member, that some 85,000 men are now in training at governmental expense. I find on page 63 of that report the statement that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, the sum of $105,000,000 was expended by the board for the work of rehabilitation, and so on. I find other items. I find, for example, that we have 29,000 men in hospitals receiving proper care. Already liberal appropriations have been made. I recall one appropriation of $18,000,000 for hospitals alone. Just how all of that money has been expended we are now seeking to find out. If further appropriations are necessary Senators on both sides of the aisle will gladly vote for them. There is no disposition in any quarter to curtail legitimate expenditures made on behalf of the soldiers.

I find that already, under the provisions of existing law, there have been paid out by the Veterans' Bureau for medical service something like $71,000,000; that over $170,000,000 have been paid out for vocational training; that there have been $585,000,000 spent by way of allotments and disbursements to soldiers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. WILLIS. I will use just a moment or so of my time on the bill, Mr. President. The report shows that there have been paid out $521,000,000 by way of compensation and insurance, or a total expenditure of $1,350,000,000. We are now expending almost $35,000,000 a month. I do not want Senators to misunderstand me. I am not complaining about that—I am proud of it—and if we need to appropriate $50,000,000 a month Senators on both sides of the aisle are ready to vote for it. I am taking issue with the proposition advocated here by gentlemen from time to time that the party in power is niggardly in its appropriations for ex-service men and is opposing legitimate expenditures for the benefit of the soldier. That is not the fact, and Senators ought to know that is not the fact. We are spending $35,000,000 a month—more than $400,000,000 a year—for the soldiers, and we will make it $800,000,000 a year if that amount is necessary to take care of them. I object to Senators trying to make a little cheap political capital out of a situation which should appeal not at all to partisanship but only to patriotism.

Touching the work of the Veterans' Bureau, I find that on the 4th of March there were more than 200,000 cases pending; and if anything shall be said touching the treatment of the soldier it ought to be remembered that whatever inequalities have come they have come very largely because of the incompetence and inefficient organization of that bureau when the opposite party had control of it. It has taken some time to get it to functioning efficiently. Now, as Senators know, the bureau is practically up to date in the transaction of its business.

There have been requested some 975,000 medical examinations. Of that number there are only 30,000 now awaiting review. Seven thousand new hospital beds are in use and 6,000 more are appropriated for and the work of construction is well under way. I am speaking of these things to call the attention of Senators to the fact that, while there have been mistakes in the performance of the work, those mistakes have been corrected so far as possible, and on neither side of the Chamber is there any disposition to stint in the matter of expenditure for the soldiers' benefit; and when the time comes, as it will very soon come, to act upon the adjusted-compensation proposition in a proper manner, I, for one, shall cast my vote in favor of the proposition, as I have already cast my vote as a citizen of my native State for the payment of the bonus by the State to Ohio soldiers.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Insert the following at the end of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina:

That for the purpose of providing adjusted compensation for the ex-service men of the United States who served in the World War the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested and required to proceed as speedily as possible to collect the interest due to the United States on the obligations of foreign Governments. Said interest, when collected as herein provided, shall be applied to the settlement of the bonus or soldiers' adjusted compensation.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has suggested a plan by which we can give to the soldiers a fair and just settlement without taking any money out of the pockets of the taxpayers of America.

A great deal is being said about excusing the indebtedness of foreign Governments, wiping out all the obligations due to us. Some tell us that the foreign countries are unable to pay us any interest. Those foreign countries are rapidly getting upon their feet.

I think it comes with poor grace from anybody, I do not care whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, to stand in this Chamber and talk of the poor condition of foreign countries and of the injustice which would be done if we should call upon them to pay the interest due this country, when 500,000 of our ex-soldiers are out of employment.

We are told that charity should begin at home. It is the duty of every man to provide well for those dependent upon him, and the Bible tells us that the man who will not do that is worse than an infidel. Do we propose to put the 500,000 ex-soldiers in the category of those who decline to provide for their households? Here they are seeking an opportunity to make a living for themselves and families. They are out of employment and suffering for the common necessities of life, suffering in the land that they saved with their valor. They are 500,000 strong, a half a million young Americans, roaming this free land out of employment, with nothing to do that will earn for them a decent living. Yet we are told by Senators on the other side that we are trying to play politics. If I were an ex-soldier I would not care what you called it. You might call it politics; you might call it something else; but if I were out of employment and were hungry and needed clothes and needed shelter I would kiss the hand of him who brought those things to me, whether he played politics while doing it or not.

Mr. President, if there is any politics in this thing it is on the side of those who have excused $450,000,000 to the profiteers. There is not any justice on earth in that. It can not be defended in any court of public opinion where justice prevails. Nobody can stand up before an audience which believes in justice and fair play and honesty and defend a vote which will take taxes off of profiteers and let them hold for themselves that tremendous sum of money and withhold it from the Government, while 500,000 of the country's defenders walk the streets begging for something to do and something to subsist upon. That is where the politics is, because in the average heart in America there is a feeling of appreciation and gratitude for the soldier who defended the country. It is a sentiment which belongs to the brave, patriotic man. But where do you get the sentiment that causes you to excuse the profiteer? It is the power of his purse in politics, and nothing else under the sun.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let me offer this idea to the Senator from Alabama. If we vote down the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina upon the ground alleged by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the whole world will construe that vote as being a prelude to a cancellation of these debts.

Mr. HEFLIN. Absolutely, Mr. President. I do not know what sort of promises were made by the Republican Party in the campaign last fall. I know they promised nearly everything. That is the cause of the trouble they are having now and the trouble they will have in the next election. Whenever they heard a murmur anywhere on the roadside, they stopped and talked to the man complaining. To every fellow who had a complaint to make they listened, and as soon as they got through listening they turned to him and promised to correct the evil or the thing complained of, and now they are confronted with so many promises that they are unable to fulfill them. They have fulfilled a few of them, as I stated the other night. They promised the big profiteers that they would take off the excess-profits tax and they have kept faith with them, but they have broken faith with the soldier; three long years have gone and still the soldier must wait.

The big holding companies did not have to wait. They have had $20,000,000 turned back into their coffers. The profiteer was the first served by the Republican leaders. They even made the big holding companies wait until the profiteers got what they wanted.

The profiteer stood rapping at your door and you opened it. You bade him come in and take a seat and you heard what he had to say. You have obeyed his behest and the profiteer is smiling down upon you his unqualified approval. He is well pleased with what you have done. But the soldier is not pleased. In the convention at Kansas City he condemned your party leaders, and yet here you are parading around and loudly proclaiming that you are the real friends of the soldiers.

Well, the soldier himself who offered his life upon the battle fields of France indorses our course and condemns yours by that action at Kansas City. Call it politics, if you please. I would rather have the good will and the approval of the boy who offered his life for me and my country than to have the approval of all the profiteers of the country.

Mr. President, the Washington Post of this morning had an article by the Associated Press headed "Farmers to burn corn this winter instead of coal." The Republican Party has been in power in the House and Senate for nearly three years. It has been in power in every branch of the Government since March 4 of this year. The farmers of the West, who have been enterprising and industrious, who have gone out and by the sweat of their brow labored to produce the wherewith to feed both man and beast, came up at the harvest time with an abundant crop, ready for the market, entitled in all fairness to receive a price that would yield a profit, but, that being denied them under a Republican administration, we find them driven to the necessity of burning their corn, of destroying by fire food for which hungry mouths are yearning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will take a little of my time on the bill.

The farmers of the West are driven to the necessity of burning corn, out of which bread could be made, corn that could be fed to hogs and cattle to produce meat to feed mankind; driven under your party's control to burn it like wood or coal. Is that politics? I am announcing to you a solemn fact.

What are these soldiers going to do? They are out of employment. You tell them to go to the farms. What is the farmer doing under your administration? He is selling his produce below the cost of production and burning his corn because he is too poor to buy coal.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I beg to call the attention of my friend to the fact that the suggestion of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] deserves special attention at this time, because he has been appointed a member of the commission on disarmament, and it has been stated in the public press that that commission intends to consider the question of canceling the foreign debts.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my good friend from Georgia for the suggestion. What are these boys to do? The occupation of farming is not profitable. Shall we advise them to go to the farms?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if he has any apprehension at all that the representatives of our Government would so far forget their duty to the people of the country as to agree to the cancellation of that debt?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, answering my friend from North Carolina, I will say that after having heard the votes and the speeches of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber I do have those apprehensions, especially as the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has stated that he can demonstrate that it would injure us if those debts were paid.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it looks to me like there is some room for doubts and misgivings about the proposition. We desire to use a part of this foreign indebtedness or the interest upon it, at least, which now amounts to about $1,400,000,000, I believe. Why not take $500,000,000 of it, or something like that, and begin the payments to the soldiers immediately? As I suggested Saturday, the minute that the country knows that the Congress has passed such a bill, whether the money is available three months hence or six months hence, the soldiers can go to the banks in the various communities of the country and obtain money to live on during the winter.

The former soldiers are out of employment. The farming occupation is unprofitable. What are the boys to do while you are permitting the foreign countries to hold back the money that is due to this Government? What are they to do, Senators? Why not vote for this amendment? This plan will not tax anybody in the United States. This money—$10,000,000,000—is now due our Government. The interest has accrued, as I have said, to the extent of about $1,400,000,000. Why not collect the interest, as provided in my amendment, which is now a part of the Simmons amendment, and use it to pay our indebtedness to the soldiers of our country? If you really want to do justice by the soldiers and square the account with them, here is an opportunity to do it without taking a dollar in taxes out of the pockets of the people here at home.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the plan to pay the obligation under the proposed adjusted compensation amendment as offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] differs from the plan of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] in this regard: As proposed by the Senator from Missouri the plan is that the amount be collected through the medium of the excess-profits tax, while the Senator from North Carolina now proposes, in order to meet this obligation, if it shall be imposed, that we pay it out of the interest collected on our foreign loans, which to-day amount to $11,000,000,000, nearly $1,000,000,000 of which is deferred interest.

This indebtedness of $11,000,000,000 is owing by 19 countries, England, France, and Italy owing about 80 per cent of it. The interest amounts to practically $550,000,000 a year. The loans were made at 5 per cent, with the exception of a part of the loans to three countries. The following loans are at 6 per cent: Austria, $24,000,000; Czechoslovakia, $2,873,000; and Hungary, $1,685,000. All of the rest of the loans are at 5 per cent. The interest on those loans has been due for two years and payment of which has been deferred for that length of time. The total debt has increased from $10,141,000,000 to $11,084,000,000.

The money which was loaned to these foreign Governments during the war and since the armistice is money which was borrowed from the people, and bonds were issued for it. The Government is to-day paying the interest on the money which was borrowed from the people to lend to these foreign Governments. That is the practical result. I claim that the interest due on the Liberty loans and the Victory loan, which we must very soon refund, is a first lien on this interest from the foreign loans. However, that is not the point which I desired to make.

Everyone knows the condition of Europe. There is a great deal of optimism expressed by Senators on the other side of the Chamber as to the possibility of the payment of this interest. I hope it will be paid, but if it is not paid, what happens under the plan of the Senator from North Carolina? Section 5 of the fifth Liberty loan act is applied.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say that the statement of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] shows that if one-fourth of the soldiers take cash the amount necessary to meet the cash payments in 1922 will be $108,000,000; if one-third take cash, the amount necessary will be $160,000,000; if one-half take cash, the amount will be $239,000,000. There is no doubt, and the Secretary of the Treasury himself expressed to the committee no doubt, that Great Britain, as soon as the two years' extension expires, will pay her interest. Great Britain owes us over $4,000,000,000, and interest upon Great Britain's debt for the next year alone will be about sufficient to pay the first installment of the bonus.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that the interest on the money we loaned Great Britain will practically take care of the first cash payment under the adjusted compensation bill, but as a business man I claim that it is not good business for the Government to assume the probability that it will be paid. We should not make the adjusted compensation bill contingent upon the payment of that interest, nor should we undertake to apply its provisions until that interest is actually paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume the Secretary of the Treasury would not have said what he did to the committee unless he had been absolutely assured that Great Britain would pay her interest after this two years' extension of time had expired.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are many contingencies involved, Mr. President, and I myself think that it is extremely doubtful whether such interest will be paid. We know at least that Italy and France and other countries may not pay interest due us by them, and if they do not, we must certainly continue to pay our own people the interest on the money which we borrowed to loan to European countries. And further and more important, we should use this money for sinking fund and reduction thereby of our national indebtedness, which will benefit all citizens, the soldiers included.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think there is no reasonable apprehension entertained by the Treasury Department that any nations except the small nations will be unable to pay or will refuse to make their interest payments next year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if they shall not do so, what will be the alternative? The alternative which is provided in the plan of the Senator from North Carolina is that under section 5 of the second Liberty bond act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury certificates, he may issue such certificates for the purpose of meeting the payments. It simply means that under the plan of the Senator from North Carolina we have either got to borrow the money or to tax the people in order to carry out the provisions of the adjusted compensation legislation.

Mr. President, I think the proposition only confuses the situation. If we are going to face this issue, let us face it directly and not rely remotely upon the income from interest with which to pay our obligations to the soldiers. At the present time, I believe that it would be disastrous further to tax the people or to ask the people to loan us money with which to pay a gratuity or a bonus to the soldiers. Our financial condition is such that it should be at least delayed even by those who believe in the proposition. I firmly believe that sound finance and common sense demand that it be thus postponed. I simply arose to say that the effort of the Senator from North Carolina is an indirect plan to get the bonus through. It is not the straightforward way. I am opposed to it at this time, and I want my opposition on that question to be quite clear.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply wish to interrupt the Senator from New Jersey to say that the provision in my amendment with reference to issuing certificates of indebtedness, if agreed to, would apply only to the deficit that might occur in any one year; and the amendment directs that in such a contingency the certificates shall be paid out of the next installment of interest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time to speak on the amendment has expired.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will now speak on the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. In my mind, there is no possibility of any deficit in the payment of interest except in the first year; and I do not believe there will be any for that year; but should there be a deficit, it would measure the difference between the payment of the interest due by Great Britain and the full payment of the bonus.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from North Carolina will admit that the estimate by the Finance Committee with regard to revenue to be produced by this bill contemplated a deficit.

Mr. SIMMONS. That has nothing to do with this matter; the deficit anticipated in the revenue bill is not embraced in the provisions of my amendment. My amendment provides only for the issuance of the certificates for the purpose of meeting any deficit that there may be in the interest payments in order to meet the installment of the bonus for that year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But I understand if such certificates are issued that eventually either bonds must be issued to replace them or the people must be taxed for that purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. The provision is that in case such certificates of indebtedness are issued for that purpose they shall be paid out and the money reimbursed to the Treasury out of the next installment of interest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not care to speak further upon this question except merely to express my opposition to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina; but in view of the fact that so many attacks have been made on Senators upon this side of the Chamber, especially upon my position in the matter, in regard to the delay involved by our votes to recommit the bonus bill at the present session, I wish to insert in the RECORD a letter which I wrote to Mr. John Mulligan, Department of New Jersey, Veterans of Foreign Wars, which fully explains my position on the bonus bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., July 15, 1921.

Mr. JOHN MULLIGAN,
Department of New Jersey, Veterans of Foreign Wars,
496 Eighteenth Avenue, Newark, N. J.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your recent letter, no one is more willing than I to be not merely just but generous to those who risked their lives for the Nation. The record of the party of which I am a member is proof that the veterans will receive fair treatment. Veterans who risked their all in the performance of duty surely expect me and all representatives to perform our duty courageously and conscientiously. What is our duty?

The President advises, the Secretary of the Treasury advises, and the great majority of able men who have studied the situation advise that the passage of the bonus bill at the present time would expose the Nation to the risk of financial disaster. If now passed, even the veterans would lose, for I am convinced that their share in the losses which would result from the great depression that would ensue would exceed any profit they might derive from the bill.

What is more, we can not afford to place the Nation in a position where it may be unable to fully perform its duty to the disabled veterans. Convinced that the enactment of the bonus bill at the present time simply invites disaster, I can not believe that veterans who are in good health and who have given thought to the matter will urge immediate action which may and probably will impair the ability of the Nation to do what it should for the disabled. Our duty is first to them, and until it is evident that in addition to caring for them we can also assist all others, those who are in sound health should wait.

The advice of the President in his message to the Senate on the 12th is most timely, and I commend it to your careful consideration.

Very truly, yours,

J. S. FRELINGHUYSEN,
United States Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I am in favor of the bonus for the ex-service man. I do not like the references which have been made to it as the cancellation of a debt, as if there were a definite amount which we owe those men which we could cancel by the payment of $400 or $500. In no sense is it a debt which can be canceled, whether we look at the great service which those men rendered or the financial and economic sacrifices which they made. It is rather but a partial recognition of the Nation's grateful appreciation of what they did and what they sacrificed.

The amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to the pending amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is but another illustration, to my mind, of the unfairness to the soldiers as well as the unwisdom from a legislative standpoint of seeking to attach this great measure of national appreciation for the ex-service man as an appendage upon some other bill. It deserves to stand upon its own foundation. It has reasons of its own to support it that are established in justice and in right. If we attach it as an appendage to the bill which is now before us, the title of which reads, "An act to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes," we are placing it legislatively where, in my judgment, it has no business to be. A bill for the recognition of the ex-service man is before the Congress. The Committee on Finance of the Senate have it now upon its recommitment to that body. It is there to receive that consideration which it deserves from its own inherent worth. It will in due time be reported to the Senate and passed.

Now comes the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to tie it up with the interest which we are to receive from the debt which foreign nations owe to us, and the Senator from Alabama adds on to that a provision that for the purpose of paying the bonus we shall immediately collect that interest. Of course the debt of foreign nations to the United States will be paid; of course the interest on that debt will be paid. What the exact amount is has not yet been determined; the rate of interest has not yet been agreed upon; the method of payment is something that must yet be determined as between friends. In a great emergency we loaned an enormous sum of money to our allies—by whose side we were fighting—and its repayment to us will be made, but it must be made under such terms and at such times as are, so far as possible, mutually satisfactory to the two parties to the original obligation. Whoever heard of one friend in a time of great emergency loaning to a partner and associate a certain sum of money and then, in connection with the repayment of that loan, fail to recognize the original friendship which prompted it and turn his back upon the original mutual obligation which was the cause of the loan? The debt due us will be repaid, but it will not be repaid as from an enemy debtor; it will be repaid in manner and in time as between friends. There are many interrelations between our debtors which are dependent upon the solution of the questions incident to the payment of their debt to us, and all require separate and undivided consideration. They can not be properly acted upon as a rider to this revenue bill.

Neither the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina nor the amendment which is proposed by my distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. REED] can, so far as I am able to determine, hasten the time when actual benefit will accrue to the ex-service men. On page 11, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina reads:

The payments authorized by the provisions of this title—

And those payments, I may add parenthetically, are the payments of the bonus to the ex-service man—shall be made in installments, beginning on the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the fifteenth day after the date of filing the application, but—

And I pause for a moment to emphasize the concluding words of the sentence—not before January 1, 1923.

Precisely the same language is used in the amendment which my distinguished colleague has introduced and which associates the payment of the bonus with the collection of an excess-profits tax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me put the Senator right in connection with his last statement. He holds in his hand the printed amendment as it was originally filed, but the dates to which he is referring were changed in the amendment as it was submitted to the Senate. The amendment was hastily prepared, and those dates were put in it originally, but before we voted corrections were made and the attention of the Senate was called to the corrections.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask my colleague what was the amended date provided in the amendment?

Mr. REED. Next July the payments would begin.

Mr. SPENCER. July, 1922?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. I gladly make the correction that in the amendments, both of the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Missouri, as originally presented the dates have been changed from the 1st of January, 1923, to the 1st of July, 1922. But what I wanted to say applies equally as well to the latter date, for in no event can any ex-service man under either one of the amendments suggested secure any benefit before July 1, 1922.

Mr. REED. The provisions as to vocational aid and farm aid would become effective as of January, 1922—next January. It is only the cash payment that would be postponed until the following July.

Mr. SPENCER. I am right in saying that, so far as the payment of money is concerned, not a dollar would be available to an ex-service man before July 1, 1922.

Mr. REED. That is correct. If he took cash, it would not be paid until that time, because there would be no revenue that would be available in a sufficient amount, the revenues being absorbed by appropriations that are made. I merely wanted the Senator to get the dates accurately. I think the error he fell into was a very natural one, because he was following the text as printed, but that has been changed.

Mr. SPENCER. I am indebted to my colleague for the correction. I merely repeat that so far as the actual money is concerned, those who want the cash payment will not find any cash payment under either amendment available until July 1, 1922; and, as I am now informed, there can be no doubt about that date.

I have some doubt myself as to whether the excess-profits tax——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired on the amendment. He has 10 minutes on the bill, if he so desires to take it.

Mr. SPENCER. I will use a part of the time on the bill.

As I was about to say, I have some doubt so far as the excess-profits tax is concerned whether there can ever be realized enough to pay the bonus. I am aware that there are differences of opinion about that. So far as I myself am concerned, I do not like the idea of tying up the bonus with the payment of interest to us by other nations, which has not yet been agreed upon, either with regard to its rate or with regard to the time of its payment. I believe that the bonus ought to be determined upon its own merits. I believe that what this Nation gives to the ex-service men, not as a cancellation of any debt that is due to them but as a recognition of the Nation's gratitude for their service and self-sacrifice, is entitled to consideration upon its own inherent merits; and I believe that long before the 1st of July, 1922, comes—that is the date which it is agreed is the earliest date upon which any ex-service man could secure a dollar under either one of these bills—this body will pass a bonus bill for ex-service men that will give to them a part, at least, of the recognition that they deserve.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I voted against the motion to recommit the bonus bill. I was paired in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and if I had been at liberty to vote I would have voted for that amendment. I took these positions for reasons that were entirely sufficient for me. I am not going to detail them to the Senate at this time.

I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] largely because it has not had the consideration of any committee of the Congress, as such a matter should have. This is a very important proposition, important not only to the Government but important to the soldier.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say that my amendment adopts the bonus bill as it was reported to the Senate by the Finance Committee, and simply adds to it the provision with reference to the method of making the annual payments.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but, Mr. President, the method of making the payments is a very important proposition which has not had the consideration of the Senate in any way, shape, or form. As a matter of fact, the adjustment of this foreign indebtedness, both of interest and of principal, is one of the very important problems confronting this Congress.

I want to see legislation brought in here that will properly meet this question. We can have no assurance of that until such proposals have been considered by a proper committee. Largely for these reasons I am going to vote against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina and any other amendments of similar kind that are presented to this bill at this time.

We have had assurances here by many Senators that in the very near future legislation will be brought forward and enacted taking care of the bonus proposition. I will vote for the levying of almost any sort of tax that will take care of this proposition. I want to suggest one or two things that I should like to see in any tax bill that is prepared to meet this proposition.

I should like to see a tax levied for the specific purpose of meeting this obligation that will touch as many of the people of this country as possible, exempting, however, every soldier from the payment of that tax so far as we can do it. Every man or woman should be glad to have a direct part in doing something for the boys who fought the battles of the Republic. On that theory I would vote for a sales tax levied for the specific purpose of creating a fund to meet this obligation. That probably could not be framed in such a way as to relieve the soldiers from the tax. I simply suggest this for those who may consider and have to do with the framing of this legislation—that an income tax be placed upon incomes over a certain amount for the specific purpose of creating a fund to meet this obligation. This could be framed so as to relieve the great majority, at any rate, of the soldiers from the payment of this tax, and also an additional inheritance tax could be imposed that would relieve all of our soldiers from the payment of money into this fund.

I make these suggestions for consideration by those who will have the framing of this legislation in the future.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Why not include a tax on excess profits in this plan?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I say, I was in favor of the Senator's amendment, including that; and if the business situation warrants, and it can be framed up in such a way as to impose a tax of that sort, and it appears to be a wise thing from a business and financial standpoint, which considerations must be taken into account, I shall be heartily in favor of it, because a tax like that would not be very much of a burden upon very many of the soldiers who will be taken care of by such legislation. Not only do I want just treatment or compensation to be accorded our soldiers, but I want it to be given to them by those who owe it to them, namely, the rest of the people.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I have listened through many weeks of time and long hours to reasons why this thing can not be done. No member of the majority has yet dared to say or will dare to say that he is against an adjusted compensation, that it is wrong in principle, that it is not a valid debt of honor to those who have served their country. You owe these men money. Does the majority understand that? Every man who was compelled to incur the perils and hardships, the agonies, the diseases, the wounds, and in nearly 100,000 cases death, did it because you made him do it, although he was willing enough if he had not been made. You compelled him to lose money just as certainly as you compelled him to risk his life and give his time. He was earning from $4 to $20 a day if he was a skilled laborer, and God knows how much if he was a business man, and you made him incur this loss. You can not repay him for his wounds. You can not repay him for the long nights of waiting, for the nostalgia, for the homesickness. You can not pay him for shattered nerves; you can not pay him for a wounded body; you can not pay him for impaired health. You can not reward him for lungs eaten up by poisonous gases. All these things are debts we owe that we never can pay; but you can figure out the difference between what he would have earned if you had let him alone and what he was compelled to lose because you conscripted him. There never was a debt of honor it was so despicable to welsh, and you dare not openly proclaim the thing you are going to do—welsh it.

Oh, you say, "We are going to give the soldiers the bonus. Just wait until we find some impossible way."

"Mother, may I go out to swim?"
"Yes, my darling daughter;
Hang your clothes on a hickory limb,
And don't go near the water."

The soldier asks for a bonus. "Yes, my darling hero. You can have a bonus just as soon as Mellon and the President and the profiteers find some way to pay it without hurting them, by and by."

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] says he is in favor of giving them a bonus, but he does not want a bonus attached to another bill. He wants it all by its little self, nothing else—just a holy and a sacred thing, set up like a statue in a niche, with the proper atmosphere all around it. But he forgets he has already had that very chance. A soliders' bonus, nothing but bonus, not a line in it about anything else, passed overwhelmingly by a Republican Congress, and the Senator from Missouri rejected it. He was told to vote against it, and we have every reason to believe that in acting upon the command of his President he accepted the reasons of his President.

If he did not accept the reasons of his President, he acted without reason—blind, unquestioning obedience, unworthy of a Senator—and if he did accept his reasons, he has said by that acceptance that he is going to vote for it when the President says it is right. If the President's reasons upon which he acted are valid, if the President's statements can be construed in the light of a common-sense construction, he will never be in favor of this bonus until it will not incur any financial obligation, until it will in no way affect the value of bonds and other securities. Of course we never can pay $4,000,000,000 without feeling it. Of course we never can pay this amount of money or incur obligations to pay it without having a greater or less effect upon other obligations. The President for all practical purposes has said he never will stand for it, and he repeated it still more emphatically in a speech here at Atlantic City, the proper atmosphere for such an utterance.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has provided a way by which this can be done without affecting your obligations in one way or another. England owes us $4,000,000,000, which she will pay. Nobody doubts that. When the English Government ceases to make English consols good, when she ceases to pay her debts, her Empire is done, and she knows it. She dare not face repudiation. The proper pressure will bring the money. Four billions of money she owes us; 5 per cent on that would be $200,000,000 a year. That would pay this bonus, and more than pay it, according to the statements of the chairman of this committee. England is paying her own soldiers a bonus out of our money, and the Senator from North Carolina simply provides that as this interest comes in from England and other nations it can be applied to this debt, and if there is not enough of it coming in the Secretary of the Treasury can issue certificates of indebtedness until it does come in and pay it.

The national credit will not be affected. More than that, the President has said that he is willing to consider the payment of this bonus only when we have gotten all our other debts paid, and all the debts other nations owe us paid. If he is willing to take the principal of the debt and pay the bonus with it, why would he object to paying it with the interest? Here is an opportunity to evade the inveterate opposition of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. We can pay this just debt with a small part of the interest due us by foreign nations.

How would England dare to refuse to pay this much needed and petty gratuity to the men who bared their breasts yonder when it seemed that the Germans were about to take the channel ports? If they had reached Abbeville, an arm of the sea only would have separated the armies into two divided and isolated columns. The English stood with their backs to the sea. Just before our Army landed a member of the British Parliament rose and said, "The question is not how we will get more soldiers to the Continent, but how we will ever get those there home." Defeat and ruin stared them in the face, and we took our place on that battle line between the advancing armies of Germany and the ruin of the British Isles, and that wall of flesh saved the puissance of the Queen of the Seas. She would be too vile to live, she would be unworthy of the proud tradition of a thousand years if she did not pay it, and what more appropriate than to take that money, which would be more willingly paid for that purpose than for any other, and pay it to the men who earned it? You can pay it, or you can "welch" a debt you dare not deny. Take your choice and face 4,000,0000 wronged heroes and your indignant countrymen "with an eye of parchment and a cheek of stone."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. STANLEY. I am through, Mr. President; but I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I think I overheard the Senator state that England is paying her soldiers a bonus.

Mr. STANLEY. That is my understanding.

Mr. EDGE. I was about to ask the Senator if he knew what type of bonus she is paying?

Mr. STANLEY. No; I do not know. She is paying to those who are out of employment, and she is paying her soldiers. She is not as tender as we are of those who have, and is more tender of those who have not.

Mr. EDGE. She is undoubtedly expending a great deal of money for rehabilitation, but I did not understand she was paying any bonus.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, this is not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator is positive she is paying a bonus——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let us have an understanding. The time of the Senator from Kentucky on the amendment having expired, does he wish this to be taken out of his allotted time on the bill?

Mr. STANLEY. No, Mr. President. I am perfectly willing to answer a question if the Senator from New Jersey will provide the time.

Mr. EDGE. This may be taken out of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then this is taken out of the time of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Now, allow me to propound the question again. If the Senator is familiar with the type of bonus, I am very much interested to have him tell the Senate what it is. According to my understanding, they are not paying a bonus, but they are expending a large amount of money in rehabilitation, as we are. I was very much interested to know if they were paying a bonus.

Mr. STANLEY. I speak from common report in the papers and advices I have received from Senators that England is paying a gratuity of some kind to her soldiers. I may have used the word "bonus," but I should not have done so. What we are to pay our soldiers will not be a bonus. I do not know that England is paying a bonus. No country ever can or ever will give these men a bonus. This is adjusted compensation. Just how England is compensating her soldiers I do not know, but I understand that she is taking care of the men who fought, is providing for their necessities. I do not know the method.

Mr. EDGE. Something similar to our war risk insurance?

Mr. STANLEY. It may be. I do not know the details of any compensation provided.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just at this time I feel like directing attention to some words full of eloquence and force that were delivered on an occasion when they were most impressive and which are strikingly appropriate now. I refer to the address of the President of the United States to the Senate on July 10, 1919. I make no excuses for taking the time, even though I would hasten the final disposition of the pending measure, to read a portion of that great address. The President said, with his unequaled power and eloquence, on that occasion:

> The hopes of the nations allied against the Central Powers were at a very low ebb when our soldiers began to pour across the sea. There was everywhere amongst them, except in their stoutest spirits, a somber foreboding of disaster. The war ended in November eight months ago, but you have only to recall what was feared in midsummer last, four short months before the armistice, to realize what it was that our timely aid accomplished alike for their morale and their physical safety. That first, never-to-be-forgotten action at Chateau-Thierry had already taken place. Our redoubtable soldiers and marines had already closed the gap the enemy had succeeded in opening for their advance upon Paris—had already turned the tide of battle back toward the frontiers of France and begun the rout that was to save Europe and the world. Thereafter the Germans were to be always forced back, back—were never to thrust successfully forward again. And yet there was no confident hope. Anxious men and women, leading spirits of France, attended the celebration of the Fourth of July last year in Paris out of generous courtesy, with no heart for festivity, little zest for hope. But they came away with something new at their hearts; they have themselves told us so. The mere sight of our men, of their vigor, of the confidence that showed itself in every movement of their stalwart figures and every turn of their swinging march, in their steady comprehending eyes and easy discipline, in the indomitable air that added spirit to everything they did, made everyone who saw them that memorable day realize that something had happened that was much more than a mere incident in the fighting, something very different from the mere arrival of fresh troops. A great moral force had flung itself into the struggle. The fine physical force of those spirited men spoke of something more than bodily vigor. They carried the great ideals of a free people at their hearts, and with that vision were unconquerable. Their very presence brought reassurance; their fighting made victory certain.
> They were recognized as crusaders, and as their thousands swelled to millions their strength was seen to mean salvation. And they were fit men to carry such a hope and make good the assurance it forecast. Finer men never went into battle; and their officers were worthy of them. This is not the occasion upon which to utter a eulogy of the armies America sent to France but perhaps, since I am speaking of their mission, I may speak also of the pride I shared with every American who saw or dealt with them there. They were the sort of men America would wish to be represented by, the sort of men every American would wish to claim as fellow countrymen and comrades in a great cause. They were terrible in battle, and gentle and helpful out of it, remembering the mothers and the sisters, the wives and the little children at home. They were free men under arms, not forgetting their ideals of duty in the midst of tasks of violence. I am proud to have had the privilege of being associated with them and of calling myself their leader.
> But I speak now of what they meant to the men by whose sides they fought and to the people with whom they mingled with such utter simplicity, as friends who asked only to be of service. They were for all the visible embodiment of America. What they did made America and all that she stood for a living reality in the thoughts not only of the people of France but also of tens of millions of men and women throughout all the toiling nations of a world standing everywhere in peril of its freedom and of the loss of everything it held dear, in deadly fear that its bonds were never to be loosed, its hopes forever to be mocked and disappointed.

Mr. President, our soldiers did not ask their Government to send them to France. They did not ask their Government to enlist them in the Army. They were perfectly willing to serve, most of them who went and many who did not were even anxious to go to France and to render this great service to their country and to the world; but they were requested to go by their Government. They were chosen to go. They were the selected men who composed the Army and Navy of the United States. Of all their comrades and associates and fellow citizens within certain ages, they were chosen and selected by their Government to render that service at that critical period in the world's history, and in these circumstances I do not feel that we should reject or turn the cold shoulder to any reasonable request those men may make. From the farms and fields, the counting room, the shops, the professions, and even the pulpit—from every walk of life and every vocation they came bounding to answer the call of their country. They performed their hazardous task with unsurpassed courage, to the honor of their country and their own glory.

They have requested this adjusted compensation. This is the proposition which they have submitted, which they have presented to the Congress, which they feel they are entitled to have accepted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And which is acceptable to their leaders.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is, as the Senator suggests, acceptable to their leaders, and to the membership of the American Legion—a proposition which is entirely reasonable and just and fair—and I submit the least we can do is, without hesitation, to extend this recognition to the brave men who maintained all the high traditions of the American soldier upon the battle field, and in every phase of the supreme service which they rendered in the manner pointed out by their superb leader in the address I have quoted.

So, Mr. President, I shall with great pleasure vote for this amendment, as I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I will vote for any sort of amendment in any form, which will carry into effect the very reasonable request of these men and accomplish what they seek, because they are entitled to this recognition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it is true that the motion to attach the adjusted compensation bill to another bill by way of amendment is just a little out of the ordinary legislative procedure. If it were not for the peculiar circumstances which have surrounded the so-called bonus bill from the beginning, I would feel more inclined to look with favor on the argument that it should not be tacked onto another bill; but the same bill which has been offered as an amendment was pending before the Senate in the regular way. It was before us for many days. It came to us after months of consideration by the Finance Committee. It was open to all the amendments which apply to a bill under any other legislative conditions. In the face of that the Senate voted to recommit the bill, and many of those who voted to recommit it, perhaps a majority of them, and those who are going to vote against the pending amendment, or at least a majority of them, say that they are in favor of the proposition which they are going to vote against, or were in favor of it when they voted to recommit it, and that they are going to bring it again before the Senate and pass it before the time fixed in the bill under which any payments could be made, to wit, July 1, 1922.

I confess, Mr. President, that when I listen to those arguments, made over and over again, I can not help feeling suspicious. If that statement be true, if that is the course we contemplate taking, then why in the name of reason and common sense did the Senate not pass the bill when it had it before it, and had an opportunity to put it on the statute books, and give notice to the soldiers and to the world that at the particular time provided in the bill it would go into effect?

The Senator from North Carolina, who voted in favor of recommitting the bill, as I understand him, gives as one of the reasons for so doing the fact that we did not have an opportunity then to provide for the payment of the money by setting aside the interest from foreign loans to take care of it.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate and I wish I could call the attention of the country to the fact that at the time that bill was recommitted there was an amendment pending, offered by myself, which provided for the payment of the bonus so-called out of interest on our foreign loans. That amendment contained an instruction to the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed to collect the interest on those foreign loans and apply it to the payment of that bonus. We could not have finished consideration of that bill, had it not been recommitted, without reaching a vote under a roll call on that amendment.

I regret that some of the Senators, who have come over now apparently and are going to vote for the pending amendment, did not see fit then to help us to vote down the motion to recommit the bill and incorporate that kind of an amendment in the bill then, when it could have been done directly. But since we have been denied even the privilege of voting in a direct way upon the interest proposition when the bill was before us, I feel that we are justified now in voting for it or for any other proposition which, by the recommitting of the bill under the peculiar circumstances, we were denied the privilege of doing.

It was asked then and it is asked now by those who are opposed to the setting aside of this interest, particularly by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] then and now both, suppose these foreign countries do not pay their interest, shall we go to war? If I may be permitted to answer that, I would say no, we will not go to war. I can not conceive of those countries not paying the interest. I can not conceive of their declining to pay, even if we do no more than to make a simple request of them to pay it. I can not grasp any conception of our late allies having our money and not paying any interest until now, when they borrowed it under a statute that had it been enforced by our officials would have required them to pay the interest at the same rate and at the same time that our own Government pays interest upon the money that it borrowed from its own people. Much as Senators seem to think this is the first time the question has been before us, I must remind them that we discussed my amendment when we had the bonus bill before us. We discussed it for a considerable length of time.

If those countries should refuse to pay interest we would be in the same position that we would be if our people refuse to pay taxes. Suppose the American people stopped paying taxes, how would the Senator from Massachusetts get his salary? Suppose the American people refused to pay their debts? I can not conceive of any reason why England should refuse to pay her debts any more than I can conceive why a taxpayer in America should refuse to pay his taxes. What would we do? It seems to me it is almost an insult to our foreign allies even to intimate that they are not going to pay the interest on what they owe us.

It is said that a former Secretary of State has promised those countries that they do not need to pay the interest, at least not yet. If such a promise has been made, it has been made without authority and contrary to law.

The statute that authorized the loaning of this money provided for its refunding. In my judgment we need no law to refund this debt. It is extremely appropriate, it seems to me, that we should direct the Secretary of the Treasury to collect this money, apply it in the payment of the obligations created by the so-called bonus bill, and if we do not get enough in that way we will pay it in the manner provided by the bill itself, out of any money that may be in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same as we pay our own salaries.

It seems to me, therefore, that Senators come with ill grace now, although I welcome them to the fold, who voted before to recommit the bill and think there are any different conditions now. Under the circumstances that surround this legislation, since it was committed under conditions which I can not take the time now to narrate, but which every Senator understands, which in my judgment were not to our credit or to the credit of the Government, it seems now that I am justified in voting for it under any circumstances, under any conditions, either as the principal proposition without any provision for the collection of the money, or as an amendment to any bill that may be before the Senate. If Senators desire to avoid that course, which I deem is an irregular course, then let them bring out of the pigeonhole of the Finance Committee the slumbering bill itself, and let us face the issue and vote it up or down as we ought to have done instead of recommitting it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we are listening to some very remarkable arguments with relation to this proposition. When it was proposed to pay the soldiers' bonus out of an excess-profits tax which was then in existence and which is now in existence and will be in existence until the 1st of next January, and which the amendment I offered proposed to extend to cover future years, we were told that that method of payment would not do.

Then we were told that it was the intention to bring in a soldiers' bonus bill and pass it immediately and to pay the bonus out of a sales tax, although the sales tax had been rejected by a decisive vote here and was utterly rejected in the House of Representatives.

When it is now proposed to pay the bonus out of the interest on foreign loans we are told that that shall not be done, and yet the very Senators who tell us it shall not be done tell us that it ought to be done and will be done within a few months.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] said this morning in his speech said also on Saturday last that it is the plan of the President to pass a bonus bill and pay it out of the very source from which the Senator from North Carolina proposes to draw.

Do Senators think that those who hear them are incapable of putting these different statements together? The argument is made that we must have a meeting with our creditors and refund their obligations. Then we are told right in connection with that by the very same Senators that they will not vote for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina because it will be an uncertain source of income and that they do not propose to offer the soldier anything so unreliable as that, and yet they tell us that as soon as they get that foreign debt refunded they are going to pass a bonus bill and pay the expense from these same foreign loans.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to remind the Senator that there is a bill pending in the Senate now which it is said must be passed during the session to refund those debts.

Mr. REED. That is true. Let us see, Mr. President. If a nation will repudiate a debt because acknowledged in one form of obligation, it will repudiate the debt no matter what the form of obligation given. If I will repudiate my promissory note of the present day, I will repudiate the renewal of that note. If I am a dishonest scoundrel and do not intend to pay my debt now, I will be the same kind of a scoundrel when the obligation is written on a different sort of paper.

Either this obligation is an obligation of an honest Government that intends to pay and will pay or it is the obligation of a dishonest Government. If it is the obligation of an honest Government, then it will be paid. So far as I am concerned, I should like to have the obligation of Great Britain or of France for almost any sum of money.

What is the present form of the obligation? It is just as sacred as any obligation that can be written. It is, in fact, a written obligation to-day. We passed a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make these loans and provided therein that he should—> take from such foreign Governments their obligations hereafter issued bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued by authority of this act.

In accordance with that—and I wish to impress this upon Senators who are trying to dodge the matter—a written obligation was taken in which those Governments solemnly recited that they were receiving this money, and that they agreed to pay it, and that they agreed to issue upon demand the particular forms of bonds provided for in the law I have just quoted. That obligation could be taken into any court in the world if it were an obligation issued by an individual and sued upon and recovered upon without any new instrument whatsoever being taken. We have that obligation; but it is said we do not know when we are going to obtain the interest under the obligation. The interest is now due, and no agreement or pretended agreement of any kind has been made that in any way affects the collection of that interest after the 1st of January next. That being the case, we must expect the interest to be paid; but if Senators desire to have these debts funded—that is, new obligations issued—and that is so easy to accomplish that it may be done before next July, then why not pass this legislation and then proceed to take the new bonds in the place of the present obligations which we hold and be ready to pay out as soon as the interest flows in?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that the Liberty bond act conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury all the power he needs in order to refund these bonds. It does not, however, confer upon him the power to exchange one set of bonds for other bonds.

Mr. REED. The Senator from North Carolina is correct. The Liberty bond act gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to take the obligations of those Governments, and to take them in the terms of the obligations which we have issued, in order to get the money.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time for the discussion of the amendment has expired.

Mr. REED. I want to take 10 minutes on the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. President, either these obligations are worth something——

Mr. LENROOT. A parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, the Senator from Missouri said he was going to speak upon the bill for 10 minutes.

Mr. REED. No, sir. I am asking to speak upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. If I can not speak on that now, I shall wait until the pending amendment to the amendment shall have been disposed of.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly the Senator can not speak upon a question not before the Senate. He can speak now only upon the bill.

Mr. REED. Very well. I can resume my remarks later. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. I will accept the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina asks for the yeas and nays on the amendment as modified.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am not sure but that a mistake has been made in ordering the yeas and nays, because I want to propose an amendment to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REED. I suggest that the ordering of the yeas and nays does not interfere with the Senator from New Mexico doing so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well. On page 17, line 12, of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, I move to strike out the numerals "1923" and insert the numerals "1922," so that as to the vocational-training feature of the adjusted compensation bill it will provide that it shall be effective on the 1st of next January. Mr. President, I have taken a very earnest interest in this legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will accept that amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well, but I should like to speak on the amendment to the amendment for a few moments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand that the amendment to the amendment is accepted by the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not accept it for the present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this situation is not going to be passed over lightly by the country. Excuses may be offered here, but there is another tribunal which will pass judgment upon the validity of these excuses. I do not intend at this time to argue the merits of adjusted compensation. I have done that heretofore. I believe there are only a few Members of this body who have expressed themselves in opposition to adjusted compensation at this time or at any other time. I do not care to address myself to those few, because I consider that it would be useless to do so. However, I do want to direct to the attention of those Senators who have expressed themselves as being in favor of the adjusted compensation measure the situation which is now presented in the Senate and concerning which they have offered their excuses.

The measure providing for compensation to the soldiers is opposed on the ground that the Treasury of the United States at this time can not afford to bear the burden. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on Saturday last presented an amendment providing a method for raising the necessary funds for that purpose. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] now presents another method. On Saturday night last and during the day other Senators proposed other means for raising the necessary money. Nearly all Senators seemed to feel that some plan should be devised for raising the money. If we accept their statements without any question of good faith, we must assume that they expect that the money shall be raised in some way and that the time is not far distant when such a measure as the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill shall be adopted and when the money will be raised.

The provision for raising the money by an excess-profits tax has been discarded. That provision of the present law could have been continued. Another proposal is now made. It is true that there is no provision now for collecting the interest due us by foreign Governments, but I have no doubt that some provision will be made in the near future. The amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, however, does provide that, if the money is not forthcoming from that source, it shall be paid by the issuance of Treasury certificates. I submit there is no reason to believe that the necessary funds can not be made available under the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

We must recall that the money loaned to our foreign allies was loaned to them for the purpose of prosecuting the Great War. We let them have the money for the purpose of preserving their countries, for the defense of their homes and their wives and children——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). The Senator's time on his amendment has expired.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from North Carolina, I believe, has indicated his willingness to accept the amendment which I proposed. With that understanding, I will now speak upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

As I was saying, we loaned this money to our allies for the purpose of aiding them in the prosecution of the war. Now, the proposition is that when they pay the interest upon it so much of the amount paid as is necessary shall be used for the purpose of making the payments under the adjusted compensation measure. May I offer the suggestion that the passage of such a measure making such provision will be an inducement for our allies to make their payments?

I have not the slightest doubt, if this measure is passed, that when the people of Great Britain, of France, and of Italy, and our other allies find out that we are going to appropriate the money so repaid to aid and compensate those who helped preserve the homes of their countries they will be glad to pay the interest. I have no doubt that the taxpayers of France when they find out that the proceeds are to be devoted to this laudable purpose, a purpose in which they were directly interested, will feel that they ought to make these payments, and there will follow the payments made to this country prayers of thanksgiving on the part of the taxpayers of France for the service which was rendered to them by the gallant soldiers of America.

Mr. President, as to the provision of this bill regarding the issuance of certificates until that money becomes available, I believe there should be no hesitation. This country is not bankrupt. Its credit is increasing from day to day. Take up the latest financial report, and you will find that every certificate that is now outstanding is selling above par in the open market. Just a few days ago the Treasury of the United States offered for sale in this country $200,000,000 of certificates, most of them bearing only 4¼ per cent interest. They were offered to the general public, and the subscriptions for the $200,000,000 amounted to $800,000,000. It shows that the people of this country are ready to buy these low-interest bearing securities of our Government. When upon an offer of $200,000,000 you get subscriptions amounting to $800,000,000, it shows that the people of this country are not in dire distress; that they are willing to take these securities. Moreover, Mr. President, in the very bill which is now before the Senate to raise revenue, we are proposing to raise enough money to pay all of the current expenses of the Government, and there is a specific provision for the retirement of $265,000,000 of our permanent debt.

In a speech which I delivered here on the 12th of last July I showed how the permanent debt of this country had been reduced. It has been reduced over $2,000,000,000 since the bonds of this country were issued. The floating debt has been reduced over a billion and a half of dollars. In this bill we are providing for the retirement of $265,000,000 a year of the permanent funded indebtedness of the country. It has already been pointed out many times that under this bill it will not be necessary to pay out, on account of this adjusted compensation feature, more than $108,000,000 during the calendar year of 1922; that the cash payment in any year will not exceed two or three hundred million dollars; that it will gradually be decreased, and it will not be a burden upon the Treasury of this country.

I want to call attention to one fact—that if we are going to pass this bill at all, it should not be deferred. It should be passed now. The amendment which I propose, and which has just been accepted by the Senator from North Carolina, provides that beginning on the 1st of January, 1922, the vocational educational provision shall go into operation. I want the people of this country to understand that if we are ever going to give any assistance under that title of the bill it ought to be done now. There can be no excuse for deferring that provision.

Take the young men of this country out of school, as we did, by the thousands and hundreds of thousands. Put them into the ranks of our armies. By so doing we took from their young manhood the very months and years which should have been devoted by them and would have been devoted by them to preparing themselves for future activities in life. You deprived them of the opportunity of going to school. There are thousands of them to-day who want to complete their education.

When are you going to do it? Next year the average age of the veterans who went into that war will be 28 years. When are you going to educate them or aid in their education? If it is to be done effectively, it should be done now. And how better can you do it than by passing this bill now and provide for payment by collecting the indebtedness which is due to this Government from our allies in the war?

Many things may be said as to why this proposition is made. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] on Saturday night said that he did not want to do this thing until after the bill was passed giving the Secretary of the Treasury the right to refund this indebtedness. As has been stated, the Secretary now has all the authority of law which he should have for any such purpose. But they have proposed a special law, a law to put it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to refund that indebtedness in any way that he might see fit to do. They want to use the compensation bill as a lever to force that legislation upon the Congress and upon the country. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] on Saturday night said that what he wants to do is to use this bill as a means to bring about a sales tax law. He said that a number of Senators went to the President of the United States last summer and begged him to come before the Congress to cause the recommittal of the bonus bill, and undoubtedly he had in mind the sales-tax provision then. The combination was then being formed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRISON in the chair). The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me, in my time, to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I notice that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] requests and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to collect this money. I am wondering if the Senator from North Carolina would not be willing to leave out the word "required"?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that I should be willing myself, but I should like to defer to the Senator from Alabama, whose amendment I accepted. I myself have no objection in the world to it, because I am certain that the Secretary would regard a request from Congress as a requirement.

Mr. KENYON. I do not believe we ought to require the Secretary of the Treasury to do something that he can not do, and, of course, we can not immediately proceed to collect this money, even if we do it with armies or navies.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will notice that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is in these words:

> That for the purpose of providing adjusted compensation for the service men of the United States who served in the World War the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby requested and required to proceed as speedily as possible to collect the interest—

And so forth. I would have supposed that meant that he was to use the usual methods of persuasion to collect the money.

Mr. KENYON. I am much obliged to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, we might as well deal plainly with one another, and call spades by their right name. The fight on this floor is between the nations who owe our Government and the nations who owe the loans that are floated by the international banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co.; and those private lenders are represented in the Cabinet by Secretary Mellon, who wants to have full control of these loans, thus putting it into the hands of J. P. Morgan & Co.

That is calling a spade a spade.

Something has been said here about using force upon England, France, and Italy in the collection of these loans. We do not have to use force. England is cornering our money in developing, in Mesopotamia and elsewhere, competitive wheat fields and cotton fields that will make it harder for the farmer of the South and the West to earn a livelihood. All that we would have to do would be to tell Great Britain in diplomatic terms that unless she honors her obligations we will send her ambassador home and recall ours, and let her face with shame the public opinion of the civilized world. Andrew Jackson once brought France to terms in just that way. What one President did, another can do.

Mr. President, there is nothing like putting a coal of fire on a terrapin's back to make it move. I am now going to put that coal of fire on the back of the Republican terrapin—I mean, that part of the Republican Party which is favoring the men who are making excessive profits at the expense of the soldier boys whose valor on the field made it possible for those men to make those excessive profits.

It is a sound principle of common sense and of law that extraordinary service deserves extraordinary pay; and that a man, wounded in my service without fault upon his part in carrying out my orders, is entitled to compensation at my hands.

Mr. President, I have not the time to read all the telegrams and letters that are pouring in upon me, and I will not at this time read those that come from the South. I will read as many as I can of those that come from the great Northwest and from the North and from the East. Then I will ask permission to have them put in the RECORD, not in print so fine that the common man can not read them, but in 8-point type, such as my own remarks will require.

Here is a telegram from Laramie, Wyo.:

"Statements as made by you are correct. Do not consider that any indecent statement was made, as same can be verified by members of the Ninety-fifth Aero Squadron stationed north of Toul, France, in May, 1918. Tommy Dobbs can verify; [so] can Maj. Davenport Johnson, United States Air Service; Capt. John Mitchell, Lynn, Mass., and many other parties, verify your assertions. I can also verify the meeting of Black Jack at Revigny, which is very far from a firing line. My service is from May 8 until they run down the curtain on November 11. Service on the front from February 16, 1918, until November 11. Number, United States Army, 23052.

"R. R. BEDDO."

From Lopez, Pa., comes a similar letter, which I beg to have printed in the RECORD.

Mr. President, here is a queer thing. In the New York Times of November 6 a colonel in the Army—P. K. McCully, jr.—said he was prison officer at Gievres, and that there was no gallows there at all.

In Atlantic City, N. J., there is a doctor—Louis Cleff—who verifies my statements.

Another doctor verifies them in the New York Globe of November 4, and from Beaumont, Tex., comes another statement which verifies them. I beg leave to have those printed in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks that certain letters and papers from which he has read be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[New York Times, Sunday, Nov. 6, 1921.]

NO GALLOWS AT GIEVRES—PRISON OFFICER ASSERTS ONLY DEATH SENTENCE WAS COMMUTED.

ANDERSON, S. C., November 5.

Senator WATSON of Georgia has been hoaxed if he has accepted as evidence the yarn of a veteran that soldiers were hanged at Gievres "by wholesale," or at all, said Col. P. K. McCully, jr., to-day. Col. McCully was prison officer at Gievres from October 14, 1918, to January 1, 1919, had the custody of the records, and possesses a copy of a statistical history of the camp which he compiled on November 8, 1918, and submitted to superior authorities.

"I knew the ground thoroughly and am fairly certain there was no gallows, gibbet, nor other lethal structure there," he said. "Only one prisoner under sentence of death was admitted during my tour of duty as prison officer, and his sentence was commuted. The records which came into my custody indicated there had been no deaths among the prisoners from any cause prior to my arrival."

[Washington Times.]

HANGED AFTER ARMY TRIAL.

BEAUMONT, TEX., November 5.

Dr. E. T. Miller, of Beaumont, who was one of the surgeons attending the 7-year-old French girl attacked by an American Negro soldier near La Rochelle Hospital in France in December, 1918, said yesterday the Negro was tried by court-martial and hanged.

He declared this was the only crime that happened in the La Rochelle area that he knew anything about and that he never heard of unjust treatment of American soldiers.

SOLDIER ATROCITY.

No. 3 MALVERN TERRACE,
Atlantic City, N. J.

EDITOR THE PRESS: I just have read an article in your valuable paper about Senator WATSON investigating some soldiers' deaths who were hanged or otherwise killed without a court-martial.

If you will allow me a little space in your paper, I will tell your readers that I have seen such an injustice committed right in my battalion, where a soldier was bayoneted in front of my company, and if called to testify I will certainly tell all I know about it. Lots more besides me witnessed this. Thank you.

LOUIS CLEFF.

TELLS OF HANGINGS—DOCTOR CONFIRMS EXECUTION OF FOUR AT IS-SUR-TILLE.

"The hanging of four soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces in Is-sur-Tille, the advance supply depot of the American forces, was confirmed to-day by Dr. Carroll E. Krichbaum, of Milburn, N. J., who is on the staff of Flower Hospital here.

"The hangings were first brought to light here by four former members of the Thirty-fourth Engineers, who now live in Passaic, N. J. In all four cases, however, the punishment was inflicted after due trial and review by competent military authority, Dr. Krichbaum declared. In each instance the culprits had been convicted either of felonious attacks upon women or girls, or else of murder.

"Dr. Krichbaum, as a medical officer, was stationed in May, 1918, at Is-sur-Tille, France. The Thirty-fourth Engineers was on duty there.

"Two Negroes and one white man were hanged in one day at this post, though Dr. Krichbaum thought their crimes had been committed elsewhere. A detail of troops drawn up in a hollow square surrounded the gallows, and the hangings were public."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the country is going to hear all of this. Senators on this side have been called demagogues. That does not apply to me. If I live, I am to be here for five more years after this year expires. I have no motive, political or personal, in ventilating these matters. My motive is one which should appeal to every right-minded Senator and citizen, to purify, as far as possible, the public service.

From Lansing, Mich., comes this:

"You bear expenses I will testify before committee appointed to investigate hanging of Yanks. I have documentary evidence of two men hung without trial. Was witness. Wire answer. I served six years with Regular Army. Will come at once.

F. B. FITCH."

Here is a letter from a boy now in Virginia. He has broken bread at my own table, at my home in Georgia, as so many soldiers have done. He says in the letter that his brother, to whom I have just telegraphed, said that he saw four dead soldiers and was told by the guard that they were hanged on the gallows. He said:

"My brother himself was sent to the honey wagon"—

Whatever that may mean.

"reduced from sergeant to private, and had some of his pay taken from him."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from Georgia that his time on the amendment has expired.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then I will ask for my additional time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right, and he is recognized for 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Here is a letter from Bearden, Tenn., in which the writer says:

"Noting from the press that you are aiming to disclose some of the atrocities of the American Expeditionary Forces in France, I offer assistance. I have conversed with many boys who saw service in France. They tell of many crimes they observed and of how they were forced to eat swill from French kitchens while American food was not far off."

He signs his name, J. D. Wyrick. He works for a lumber company.

Mr. President, there is a letter here which shows how men were shot down because they fell exhausted from long marches. They were not only left to die by the roadside, but were shot. There is one letter here which I will not put in the RECORD, because it is unfit to print, though I will show it to any Senator who wants to see it. It shows how at least one officer defiled the food of the men so that even a dog could not have eaten it.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] says he is against a bonus on principle. What principle? Does he know any more about principle than George Washington knew? Everybody here knows, or can easily ascertain, that George Washington obtained a bonus of 10,000 acres of land for his services in the old French and Indian War.

Has the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] read the Old Testament? In almost every case where the Jews went to war they were promised a bonus before they went, and were paid it after they came home. In nearly every war the victors were given a bonus in some form or other. You can call it by whatever name you please—bounty, compensation, bonus, pension, home, or hospital—what is it, after all, but the same thing? Abraham Lincoln's favorite resort for quiet and rest from the arduous cares of his duties was the Soldiers' Home in this city, which is now one of the most beautiful spots on earth. Is not the providing of a home like that a bonus? I myself visited the beautiful soldiers' home near Old Point Comfort, in Virginia.

Henry W. Grady, of my State, who, as another Georgian—John Temple Graves said, "loved the South and the North, interloving each other"—was the founder of our soldiers' home at Atlanta, which was a bonus to the homeless soldier. You will find such homes all over this land.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] reproached my State by name, alluding to me by name, because we had done nothing for the ex-service men of the World War. In the first place, it is the business of the Federal Government to take care of that. In the second place, our State has been so completely robbed under commercial methods by the very profiteers to whom you are giving preference instead of to the soldier that we have a deficit of $3,000,000, and we are even now sacrificing some of the State's best property to make good that deficit, and the profiteering corporations have the money of which our people have been robbed.

Mr. President, I will not longer take the time of the Senate, understanding as I do that I have permission to print these other documents in the RECORD in 8-point type.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent to print in 8-point type certain exhibits. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. They are cumulative to those I have already had printed.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORFOLK, VA., November 5, 1921.

DEAR SIR: With great interest I have read several of your speeches in the United States Senate relative to the mistreatment of soldiers in France from several CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS which I happened to see, and wish to say that as a former American soldier I hope that you will press the charges and that the guilty parties be punished.

From my personal observations and experiences I do not doubt one word of your statements, though I witnessed no such severe instances as those which you named. However, in the Headquarters Detachment of the Thirty-sixth Artillery Brigade, Coast Artillery Corps, of which I was a member, the officers required the men to act as servants for them from the time we arrived in France until we departed. In no instances were the services voluntarily rendered or paid for, as both Federal laws and military regulations prescribe. These statements I can easily prove by any of the former members of the unit, one of whom is now a resident of Washington, D. C. I may also add that one of these officers is also a resident there, and his father, a former Congressman, on one occasion visited him over there and ate at a table with officers upon which enlisted men were forced to wait and serve. This man was a Congressman at the time.

We had been in France exactly one week when we were reminded by an officer, "Remember, you are not in the United States now"; this in a threatening manner.

I could tell you of many more instances of mistreatment of enlisted men, especially in regard to the voyage back to this country, had I only the time to do so. Perhaps, if you would be willing for me to do so, I might run up to Washington some Sunday and talk over some of these matters with you. Excuse my using vulgar slang to a man of your standing, but I am better able to express it when I say that you seem to be the only man with "guts enough" to make these charges.

Thanking you for your work in behalf of the former service men, I am.

Very truly, yours,

——— ———.

NEW YORK, November 4, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. WATSON: Reading in the daily papers in regards as to American soldiers being murdered, as I call it, without a trial, let me try and help you bring another case to light.

I wish you would take up the case of Pvt. August Wolf, of Veterinary Hospital 2A, and see how he was murdered by an officer named Baldthaser, who ordered an M. P. (military policeman) named Von Riper to shoot him when Wolf refused to be manhandled when ordered under arrest.

What made me write this letter to you was because that over in his mother's home there hangs a large certificate reading that August Wolf had died or been killed while performing his duties at the front, and as a member of the same company I wish to state frankly that the nearest that we ever came to the front was about 50 miles.

His mother resides at No. 5705 New Utrecht Avenue, Brooklyn.

Having no more to say and hope to read of this letter in the papers in the near future, I close.

Hon. Senator WATSON:

I read about your investigation about the cruelties in France against our own soldiers. * * * I have seen enough of our fine officers. Lots of poor fellows got shot or hung.

NEW YORK, November 5, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As a man who served overseas in a fighting unit, I write this letter to you hoping it will aid in your fight to bring before the people of this country a keener realization of the brutality of war.

I am a stock broker and an investment bond dealer. My statements can be made under oath or otherwise. To me war means the befouling of finer instincts, as well as a hopeless waste of money. The handwriting of a great God is on the wall as never before that war is futile. Can we not believe in a greater power than our own as trying to guide us in our lives here? Nations can develop without war. War is old-fashioned, stupid. You can do a great work. Go to it without flinching.

In Camp Bassens, France, a Sergt. Krupa had been out on a large drunk the night before. He was in charge of the prison camp area the following day. The mess line was eagerly awaiting eats. Krupa had his gat on the hip watching the line. Some one laughed a little. Krupa commanded "silence" to about a hundred men. Many of these men had done magnificent duty at the front. There were white and colored amongst them. Inflamed with the "hang over," Krupa was nervous and excitable. The chuckle of a big colored fellow irritated Krupa. A private, a sentry, doing his post turn, came within several yards of Krupa and had turned to go back along his post. Krupa rushed after the sentry, grabbed his rifle off his shoulder, rushed back at the line of men in line at the mess, said, "You * * * I'll show you if you can laugh at me," pulled down the safety catch on the rifle, and the next—"thud." A bullet pierced the lungs of a great big fine chap standing at the door of the bunk house. I helped to hold the stricken soldier for a few minutes as the blood spurted from a hole in his chest. In a little while his life was gone. I was mad. I looked at Krupa for a long time. I saw only brute strength in this man. There was no soul there. The men were wild. I pulled my gat and said, "Men, stand back; go back of the bunk houses," or something like that. My revolver was in my fist and cocked. An old-time soldier, who had been in the Army a long time, a prisoner, was near me, within a few inches. He said in a kindly tone, "Son, put the gun up; there has been enough murder around to-day." I did put up my gun, and am glad of it.

The riot went no further. A captain came along soon. Krupa was taken off the post a while. Col. Green and others made a quick examination. Krupa came back into the camp area exonerated as having done this thing accidentally. He again paced the camp area with his gun on his hip in charge as usual. What could the men do? At every corner were sentries outside the wire fence with loaded rifles. The prisoners were in for petty things as well as greater offenses. Krupa was their boss, and he had just killed a man.

I told the captain what I thought of the matter, and the captain agreed with me that Krupa was a dangerous man. Not so Col. Green. His idea of Krupa was that he wanted him on his personal staff, and undoubtedly Krupa and the colonel would have made a keen pair.

This man who was killed had a family at home, so I understand. He was a railroad man—a brakeman or fireman—a six-footer.

I would like to see the Army record of this thing; and it may be possible to find this somewhere.

Just to let you know that I am with you in any attempt you may make to show up matters, I write this letter, and for the good of the cause of the elimination of asinine war.

Krupa and I were in Company D, Three hundred and forty-eighth Infantry. We neither had been to the front.

J. W. Hinchey was a member of the Thirty-fourth Engineers, Company M, stationed at Camp Williams, France. The two men that were hanged took place at a French camp named Camp President Wilson and was a public hanging. I was not an official witness, but saw what took place and could identify the photograph of the gallows. Took place either in May or June, 1919.

CARROLLTON, GA., November 4, 1921.

DEAR SIR: I notice that some of our worthy Senators seem to doubt your word as to cruelty of American soldiers overseas. I want to state that I saw Pvt. Fitzergald, of Indianapolis, Ind., killed. His outfit was the Sixty-fifth Engineers. He was killed by Sergt. Miller, of Pittsburgh, Pa., who was a Polack, but went by the name of Miller.

Pvt. Fitzgerald was a married man, having three children. There was a letter taken from his pocket next day that stated these facts.

If ever Sergt. Miller was court-martialed we never heard of it. But I understood that the colonel patted him on the back and said, "I wish I had a hundred more like you."

The cause of this boy getting killed was a Negro stepped in front of me to get something to eat, or at least try to. The sergeant jerked the sentry's gun, brought at thrust at the same time, asking the Negro what in the h—— are you doing here? The Negro run. The sergeant turned around with gun, pulled the safety off, and pulled the trigger. Pvt. Fitzgerald was standing in front of gun and was killled. We were working from 6 to 6 and getting one sandwich for dinner. Capt. Tyler was in charge of the prison camp. I understand his home was in San Francisco, Calif.

For information concerning another prison camp—St. Touba—have Lieut. Col. Hubbard show the investigation he held, caused by three prisoners writing to Maj. Gen. Rhodes, without going through proper channels and through French mail. Here water was over hip boots a good part of winter, being half fed, allowed no tobacco; boys begged it from German prisoners. Wishing you success, I am,

BIRMINGHAM ALA, November 4, 1921.

HON. THOMAS WATSON,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As I understand that there will be an investigation of your statements before the Senate with reference to the "hanging and shooting" of the soldiers of the United States while in France without trial or court-martial.

As I believe you are right, I will tell you of an instance where there was an enlisted man shot and killed by a major of the Fifty-eighth Infantry without a reasonable cause.

My brother-in-law, Zebra S. Shell, private, Company E, of Fifty-eighth Infantry, was an eyewitness to the actual shooting of the enlisted man. His address is Piedmont, Ala., and he will be glad to come before the committee and tell of the shooting of the soldier. The only excuse that the major had for shooting the soldier was that after the company had been on a forced march for 24 hours and the man was completely fatigued and had to fall "out," and just because he told the major that he could not go any farther, the major pulled a gun and shot the soldier dead, and the soldier begging him not to shoot, as he was very sick and could not stand upon his feet.

This was told to me by my brother-in-law just after his return to the United States after the war. And, if I remember right, he said that the major who done the killing was later wounded or killed while in action.

But the fact that the killing was done and without a trial of any kind will show in part that your charges are true with reference to the executions of the soldiers, no matter if the officer was later killed or missing in action.

I myself will be glad to come to Washington and go before the committee and repeat the story as told to me just after the close of the war.

Trusting that this information will be of some use to you and that you will call on me if you think I could be of any help in the matter.

Yours, very respectfully,

——— ———.

(Ex-private, Troop A, First Cavalry, Regulars.)

NEW YORK CITY, November 4, 1921.

DEAR SENATOR WATSON: As I am an ex-soldier and am very willing to go at any time my country needs me again, it is only natural that I should take interest in your good work in behalf of the ex-service men of the United States.

I am very much interested in your statements of the abuse and hangings of American soldiers in France during the war and also after the war. I am going to tell you of one instance of one of our men being killed without a court-martial long after the war was over. I was in the Medical Detachment of Veterinary Hospital 2B, stationed for 11 months in the town called Treveray, France. The hospital was being split in half to make two hospitals, and half of our men were being moved to another town to form another veterinary hospital. All of the men except four or five were moved to the new town, and the four or five that was left were to move on the very day that this poor soldier was murdered. It happened this way—and you can judge for yourself whether the military police was right and justified in what he done: A few of the soldiers that was leaving the town which they had been in so long was bidding their friends, both American and French, good-by, and must have drank a little too much. This soldier—Wolf was his name—was placed under arrest by a military policeman named Van Riper. Wolf, of course, under the influence of liquor, did not like the idea of being locked up, and he did not walk fast enough to suit the military policeman, and he (the military policeman) became very abusive to Private Wolf, and Wolf resented it and having some hot words with Van Riper, the military policeman, when along came our captain, and seeing what was going on between the soldier and two military policemen, said to Van Riper, "Oh, don't fool with him, give it to him," meaning for Van Riper to shoot Wolf, which he did right there and then.

I was the orderly on the ambulance that took Private Wolf to the hospital at Gondrecourt, where he died the following night; and, to make things worse, Private Van Riper did not come to trial for nearly six months after he killed Private Wolf, and then he was discharged; and in the six months before the trial Van Riper still continued to act as military policeman.

I want to say right here that Capt. Balthaser was a lucky man that some of the French people did not shoot him for his cowardly act in telling Van Riper to shoot Wolf. The whole town was up in arms against Capt. Balthaser when they found out what he had done. There was many of our poor American soldiers killed and abused by some of the men we had for officers in France.

I wish you could look up the War Department's record and see what the report was on Wolf and how he came to his death. I can furnish the full details by getting some of the boys who were in the same company with me. If you wish me to come before any committee or furnish you with more details concerning this case, I will gladly do so. I can speak now where I did not dare speak before.

Good luck to you. (Signed) ——— ———.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., November 3, 1921.

DEAR SIR: I hope your investigation of legal lynchings overseas will result in some good.

It might interest you to know that I saw a most cruel execution of a soldier from your State.

The scaffold was erected days in advance of the hanging. On the morning of the hanging the soldier was brought out and forced to stand in front of the scaffold at least an hour. One could not have been subjected to a more torturesome death. He was dropped from the scaffold three times and tortured intensely for perhaps 30 minutes. The hangman's rope was cut into bits and passed around as souvenirs. Many persons, including general, field, and staff officers, as well as many soldiers and civilians, witnessed this scene.

Very respectfully, ——— ———.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 4, 1921.

DEAR SENATOR WATSON: I send you these few lines now to thank you, and especially your secretary, for what you did for me in adjusting my claim with the Veterans' Bureau. I was held in the hospital for four months the last time, and sometimes had to go hungry. I managed to get a transfer to a hospital in Washington so that I may have my claim adjusted. I was insulted and told by one of the examiners in the bureau that if I stayed in the hospital and just think I was injured, I would be. I will furnish his name.

I was in a hospital in France with one arm and hand bound and in sling; was ordered by nurses to sweep floors, clean spittoons, and did not get enough to eat. I heard these same nurses plotting to chloroform a major at a dance they were to attend the night following.

Very truly, yours, ——— ———.

BOSTON, MASS., November 4, 1921.

Hon. Mr. WATSON,
United States Senator from Georgia,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A word about Prussianism in the Army. I would like to inform you of a first lieutenant by the name of Kimball, Battery B, Fifty-fifth Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, who emptied his pistol into his own men, wounding a private by the name of Wilson in the arm for running toward the enemy.

Also, Col. Sevier, of the same regiment, while passing through England, hundreds of miles from the front, issued orders for the officers to shoot any stragglers who should happen to fall out of ranks, and a captain by the name of John Stitt, of New Bedford, who had two men fall out from exhaustion, was relieved of command because he did not comply with the order.

Look up the Kimball incident and get in communication with Capt. John Stitt, New Bedford, Mass., and if they are afraid to face the music I will make myself known and go to Washington to testify in your assistance. Get that dirty gang before they get you.

ATLANTA, GA.

SENATOR WATSON: After reading a piece in the paper in reference to men being hung in France without court-martial I would like to say while in France, at Mehun Sur Yerve, Camp A. P. O. 741, I know that numbers of men died there through neglect of attention, and I would like to say further if you could have been there and seen some of the same things as I you would no doubt have the same impression as I. If you had to sleep in barracks with about two blankets and a straw tick, and in wintertime at that, and never get sick you would have to be made of iron to stand it. I can truthfully say, although I am still alive and have lost my health to a certain extent, I feel that I have never yet received a fair deal in my case, and furthermore some day I feel that we will all be rewarded for what we thought was right and went to France to fight, sleep in fields, trenches, and box cars, eat what we could get and under any kind of treatment that we would take. I am sure if there was a vote taken you would find that two-thirds would say the same as I myself would say.

I know that men stood in the rain and waited for medical attention when it was enough to kill any human, and then be sent to their barracks where it was cold and where you would not put your own horse to sleep; it was war no doubt, but under conditions they could have been better; no officer stood what the enlisted men, and no one can tell me that they did, and I am sure if I could ever have the chance to talk to you I could say more. I am very glad that you are the man you are and trying to do what is right for the benefit of the ex-soldiers, some who are no more. I trust and hope that you will do all you can for them. And I am sure some day you will be rewarded for your good work. I was over there about 17 months and my Army service was three years and two months. I trust that you will succeed in your good work.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

MR. BENJAMIN HAYS, 1312 THIRTY-FOURTH STREET, CITY, THE CIVILIAN BOSS WHO INTERCEDED IN HAVING THE BOY SENT TO THE HOSPITAL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 5.

Hon. Senator WATSON.

DEAR SIR: Admiring your stand toward the soldiers, I wish to call your attention to a case that happened at Camp Meigs, this city. If you will call on or have the person (address below) tell you the story, I think you will say that it was as brutal as anything that happened in France. This boy was knocked and beaten, dragged around on the road cinders until the blood ran out of his clothes; was prodded with bayonet, and the wounds got in such condition the person I refer you to below, who was a civilian boss there, told the captain that if there was not something done for that fellow he would take the matter to the civilian authorities. He was sent to the Walter Reed Hospital and died in a few days. I wish you would call on this man and hear the story, and if that is not proof enough I have a boy who was an eyewitness, who will be glad to tell the story. I am withholding my name for reasons, but if this should interest you I will see that my boy comes here and tells the story.

Very respectfully,

——— ———.

WEST ROXBURY, MASS.,
November 5, 1921.

DEAR SENATOR: You are to be congratulated upon the grand stand you are making in the name of righteousness and justice. It is rather to be deplored that we haven't got more American Senators and Representatives who have got the courage and the fearlessness to state the truth as you do. The sentiments of more than 3,000,000 ex-soldiers and their friends are back of you. There were many outrageous acts endured by the American soldiers in France that the American public is not aware of. The brutalities that were experienced by many soldiers will never be known, because the victims of these brutalities are lying in their silent graves.

I have been railroaded to military prison known as the Disciplinary Barracks, Fort Alexandria, Coblenz, Germany. While I was there I have seen soldiers shot and wounded because they wouldn't stand at attention in the mess line. I have seen their hand tied to their side, with puttees around their legs, and kept standing at attention for hours at a time when temperature was 95° in the shade, until they would drop in a heap unconscious. I have seen soldiers who were dragged out of their beds at midnight and given cold showers and cruelly beaten for absolutely nothing. It was a common occurrence to see men made to double time in hot July days for hours at a time until they dropped unconscious and beaten unmercifully. I myself have been driven insane and attempted to commit suicide, and later was taken to a hospital, where I have been confined as an insane patient for about 11 months, due to the horrible treatment I experienced there. I am still at the hospital trying to recover my health.

The German and the Prussianized methods or barbarities had nothing on the cruelties practiced at this disciplinary barracks. There was another soldier driven insane, but I do not remember his name. At one time I reached such a point that it was thought that I was going to die. If I was to recall some of the monstrosities practiced there it would make one's hair stand up. Most of the soldiers at this disciplinary barracks were there for trifling incidents and none had more than six months to serve.

In any event that I can be of any assistance to you in your exposures of the gross mistreatment of American soldiers I will only be too glad to give you any assistance that you may need. I am willing to take any oath, if necessary, as to the truth of these statements and am willing to give names of those responsible for the conditions there.

Wishing you the best of luck in all your endeavors and hoping that this letter will find you in the best of health, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

Mr. TOM WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see in the papers there is some dispute about men being shot in France without trial. I spent 18 months in France myself, and went from Columbia, S. C. I was in the Field Artillery. When we landed in France the weather was cold. We camped in some old buildings, with cement floors. The Army officers had provided no wood for us to make fires, as they should, so we went at night about 3¼ miles up on a hill and stole wood to dry out the building, and slept in safety. In a few days the French missed the wood and reported us to our officers. So the next morning we was all lined up and asked if we got the wood. Each boy was forced to lie and say "No." That night a guard was put in the woods, but we went back after more wood, but we went another way. One of my company was shot in the woods and one was captured. We all ran back to the camp and said nothing. The next morning just before sunrise the other boy was shot, and they was both brought down dead. The boy that was shot in the morning was Odes Brownlee. I don't know the other's name.

Now, I would like to say to the President of the United States Senate in the name of Almighty God if those two boys was tried they was tried in the woods between the setting and the rising of the sun.

I don't know you, Mr. WATSON. I never saw you in my life. I have no interest in you more than to see justice done.

What I have written here is the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help me Almighty God in the name of truth.

May God bless you all.

GEORGIA, McDuffie County:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, an officer of this State authorized to administer oaths, E. B. Lazenby, who first being sworn on oath, says that he is a resident of McDuffie County, Ga., and that he served overseas in the American Expeditionary Force to France, and he makes the following statement voluntarily and of his own free will and accord and without reward or hope of reward, the statement being as follows: The sword of Damocles in the shape of court-martial ever hung over the heads of soldiers.

I was twice threatened with court-martial by an Irish Catholic officer named Haggerty simply because I wrote something to my mother, which in his opinion he thought should be deleted.

My letters were mutilated for the sole reason that I gave a description of an artillery camp in France, and portrayed things in their true light. We had been instructed that we could write home and tell these things. In fact, there was an order from the colonel of our regiment that we could do so.

Another time I wrote a letter to a soldier friend in France and told him of a poor Bowery kid who knew nothing of horses having his head crushed from being thrown from a horse. I was threatened with court-martial for this.

I heard Army officers curse men and threaten to shoot them when just in rear of battle lines. I cite an instance: Officer Gilly, lieutenant, Battery D, Three hundred and twenty-first Field Artillery.

I was hounded and persecuted because I was from the home of TOM WATSON.

We were underfed while upon the front. Oft'times no bread; sometimes one slice of stale brown or black bread, with some putrid "corn willie," and sloppy bread pudding that even a dog would not eat in this country. There was no excuse for such when there were mountains of good food rotting in the ports. The officers got theirs.

The officers had cots to sleep upon and tons of baggage that we privates had to carry around for them to have comforts.

We were allowed to go ragged when there were two or three suits for every soldier in France. I had to steal shoes and trousers, because my supply seargeant had a grudge against me. Some of my officers were callous or indifferent, but on the whole my lot was exceedingly fortunate in comparison with what I witnessed among others.

It would take volumes to relate everything that was repugnant to a decent man. The Army in France has crushed the life, esprit, or the morale of many a former high-toned citizen.

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned, an officer of this State authorized to administer oaths, Meynard Booker, who, first having been duly sworn, on oath says that he is a resident of Lincoln County and State of Georgia, and that he served overseas in the American Expeditionary Forces to France as a private; and that for several weeks he and the men in his company didn't get enough of food and some of the men were forced to steal food when they could to satisfy the pangs of hunger; and that this deponent himself upon hearing of the Pennsylvania troops, some of whom was stationed near his camp, being fed by some of the Negro regiments, decided to try as much as once to get a good square meal, and went down to where the Negro regiment was stationed and asked for a meal, which was given him; and he also found to his surprise that the Negro troops were given plenty of food, and all of which was good food. This deponent wishes to state that the Negro cooks were very nice to the hungry white troops, and when they could would give them all they wanted to eat. And that finally, when the stores of food were to be moved, guards were stationed along the line of removal to keep the hungry troops from eating the food to satisfy their hunger. And that there was no need of any of the troops going hungry, as this deponent believes that there was plenty of food for all in the ports and Army stores.

This affidavit is made in the interest of truth and without reward or hope of reward.

Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Just a few lines, as I have been reading the newspapers, I see that you are doing your bit for the soldiers, so I will give you something to work on. I applied for enlistment about February 7, 1918, at the draft board, Moline, Ill. I quit a job switching cars for the Rock Island Railway Co. I was then sent to Charlotte, N. C. There I was examined for military service. I was sworn in the 13th of February, 1918. Later, after being in the service, I was taken down sick. I was in and out of the hospital several times, so one day they put me up before a board of doctors. They recommended me for a surgeon's certificate of disability; marked me quarters; told me to go back to my company and wait for my discharge. Later on orders came to pack up to go overseas. They said everybody fall in; after everybody had fallen in the company commander said all names I call fall out; so he never called my name, so I marched to the Southern Railway yards and loaded on the train. Before the train left he came around and said, "———, I don't know what to do with you; you were recommended for a surgeon's certificate of disability, but I haven't received it." I told him if he didn't know what to do with me, I was sure I didn't know. So I went with my outfit to Camp Mills, N. Y., then was loaded on a transport, landed in Southampton, England. Later on was stationed about 75 miles back of lines; then was stationed under the English to demonstrate the Lewis machine gun and to show us how to fight. So one morning, on the 31st day of May, 1918, a bunch of us was put with an English sergeant to take instructions from him how to operate a Lewis machine gun. I noticed that they were awfully interested where they placed me and another soldier, but didn't give it a thought that they were trying to kill us. But, after taking a few instructions, all of a sudden the gun went off, shot me through the left arm and the other fellow three places in the foot. About five bullets went through my gas mask. The other soldier's name is ———; he lives in Indiana, but I don't know what town. I don't understand why they were instructing about a gun and using ball ammunition. I judge that there were as much as a dozen shots came from that gun. I wish you would investigate this matter. My native State is Florida. I am now suffering with paralysis in my left hand and bad eyesight. I was with the Fourth Division, Company K, Fifty-ninth Infantry.

Yours, very truly,

ATLANTA, GA., November 4, 1921.

Senator THOMAS E. WATSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have been reading the newspaper accounts of your charges in the Senate relating to unauthorized execution of soldiers in our Expeditionary Forces in France, and think I should relate to you an experience which I had while located at Gievres, France, in 1919, which seems to partially substantiate the charges which you have made.

While in charge of a warehouse at Gievres, France, where I slept at night, I was awakened about sunup one morning by loud cries of a man, and went out to investigate the matter. There was a thick forest of several acres about 50 to 100 yards from the warehouse in which I was sleeping, and I found that the cries were coming from that place. When I undertook to investigate the cause of the cries, I was stopped by a marine, who was on guard duty, and was informed that the man who had been crying out was to be hung. Later I related this experience to some members of my company, and they come down and went into the woods referred to, and not only saw the scaffold, but some of them got upon it and had their photographs taken. This scaffold remained in the woods as long as I was located at Gievres, and I saw it a number of times. I don't know whether or not anybody else was hung on this scaffold, but I was told by a marine, at the time of the hanging referred to, that another man was to be hung the following Friday on the same scaffold, and I heard, generally, that others were actually hung upon it.

I have never understood why this scaffold was built in the particular place referred to, as it was approximately 2 miles from the prison.

I might say further that I was told by one of the marines who was in the party guarding this execution, that the man to be hung had been forced to dig his own grave the day before. Whether or not that statement was true, I can not say, and would not even venture to express an opinion on that point. I am merely repeating substantially what this guard told me.

For obvious reasons I do not care to become involved in this matter, but felt that I should give you this information for whatever it might be worth to you.

Very respectfully,

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of inclosing herewith several newspaper clippings which I feel confident will interest you, especially at the present time.

The shipment of this soldier's body C. O. D. to his home and parents ought to be exposed and the facts given to the Senate.

I will recall to mind that 10 days after war was declared with Germany the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, placed an order for 200,000 coffins with a firm at Framingham, Mass. Plenty coffins, but no guns. What disposition was made of this enormous supply of coffins, as I understand none were shipped overseas? They might have spared one of them for this boy's body.

Very respectfully, yours,

BATON ROUGE, LA., November 4, 1921.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: For one I wish to congratulate the manly stand you are taking for those who were unable to defend themselves from such dastardly and untimely end.

I soldiered under Gen. Pershing for nearly two years over in the Philippine Islands, and at one time our quarters were but a stone's throw from his residence, so I happen to know him and of him pretty well. My main object in writing this is, after reading the contemptible newspapers, especially the inclosed clipping, I feel it my duty to just mention an incident over in the islands, which my word need not be taken for, but you can verify same by getting the Manila Times or any of the papers in Manila printed during the years of 1912 and 1914, and you will find how they roasted the supposed-to-be wonderful general he is not. For over a year poor privates were being chopped down like dogs by the natives and nary a word did he say, not less try to prevent same; but during one night they got bold enough to knock close to his haven of rest and chopped up Capt. Watson and a lieutenant, whose name I can not remember. It was then only did he get busy and surround the hill of Boc-Sac, located in Jolo, P. I., and cleaned those natives out, both guilty and innocent. They at least numbered 3,000. That's the kind of general he is. When and as long as a poor private got it in the neck it was all right, but when they started to knock on his own doors he got busy and made a big job of it; and, of course, got a big write up for the wonderful general he is—back home in the United States of America.

Right here in this city is a boy who was "over there" and saw two unfortunates made to build their own scaffold, and can vouch for at least another hanging that took place right in the vicinity of where he was stationed, and beyond doubt can be proven by many of his comrades. Yet I bet Pershing would say that is a lie. I would not be afraid to bet that man never smelled gunpowder all the time he was in France, not less go to the front. It was fine for him to be back of the lines partaking of all the fat of the land while the poor unfortunates were treated like dogs; and now for him to be showered with all kinds of riches and entertainments of every description, while the many thousands upon thousands who bled like dogs are suffering for want. I wonder if he would say that's a lie?

It is pitiful this land of ours is not composed of at least a few thousand public men of your station and backbone. Surely it would be the best country in the world if it was, and God surely will not let your wonderful undertakings and work go unrewarded. So keep up the good work, and I am sure it won't be long when you will have all those that have covered things up taking to the woods for shelter, if they are not already routed.

With my every good wish—and I am positive with every other "buddy" in and out of the ranks—for your complete success, and may God always bless you and yours, I remain,

An ex-private of the old Infantry,

———.

GEORGIA, McDuffie County:

Personally appeared before me, the undersigned officer authorized to administer oaths in the State of Georgia, A. A. Young, of said county, who first being duly sworn says on oath that he was in the Army of the United States from July 22, 1918, until August 27, 1919, and was for about 11 months overseas in France and Germany; that deponent belonged to First Division and was a member of Second Machine Gun Battalion, Company C.

That deponent knows that it was the rule of that part of the Army to which he belonged to imprison privates and work them, under guard, for at least three months before trial, and in a number of cases there was never a trial. It was the general practice of officers from second lieutenant up to point out any man to the guard, and without preferring any charges have him imprisoned; that in a number of these cases, or alleged cases, the man imprisoned could not tell, if his life was at stake, what he was being punished for.

Deponent further deposes and says that one of his captains was named Hale who ordered that the mules be put in houses and that the men sleep in the mud and water, saying that it would cost only $11.20 to get a man over there while it would cost over a hundred dollars to get a mule over there; that these orders were carried out, the mules being put in the houses and the men in the mud and water.

Deponent further deposes and says that while he was in France he learned that the foodstuffs of America, which were shipped to France, went first to a place of division where there was a French officer in charge and was there divided, the rough food being given to the Army and the food fit to eat being divided out among the fashionable hotels of France; that this fact is generally known among the soldiers of this division, almost any of whom, I presume, will verify this statement.

Deponent further deposes and says that he with his division marched from Sedan, France, to Monbaur, Germany, which required 43 days; that while on this march deponent was barefooted and practically naked and hungry; that he was supposed to get at least one meal a day (according to what he was told by the officers), but in place of getting this one meal he did not hardly get one meal in two days; that while on this said march deponent has seen men fall from the line of march because of sickness, hunger, or sore feet, and has seen them kicked out of the path of the march by the soldiers coming on behind; in fact, this was the practice, and it was the rule to never stop when a man had fallen out of the line of march, never to step around him, but to keep your step, if to keep it your foot had to trample in the fallen man's face.

That while deponent was with his said division in Germany, at Hohr, on or about the last day of December, 1918, on Sunday, while it was sleeting and snowing, he, with said division, were ordered to stand "at attention" from 8 o'clock in the morning until 4 in the afternoon, to await the passing of Gen. Pershing, who never came; that during this time said soldiers were without food, not being allowed to eat.

ATLANTA, GA.

DEAR SIR: There were about 10 soldiers who made up the party of inquisitives at Gievres, France, that went on an investigation tour about June 24, 1919, having as an objective the alleged gallows upon which it was asserted by many soldiers some 21 American expeditionary soldiers had already been hanged and a whole jail full awaiting their fated morning.

I was in the party. We left camp about 9.30 o'clock and in 45 minutes had left all camp buildings, or buildings of any kind, and were nearing a grove of pine trees, which was about 150 or 200 yards in diameter. On approaching it there was nothing to be seen which might have confirmed the assertion that in it was a gallows, except that we noticed an armed guard or two patrolling the edge. There were no houses near by, and seemingly nothing to guard, so we deduced that the gallows must really be there.

The guards did not hail us and we proceeded to the grove center. It was on approaching that center that we discerned a scaffoldlike structure, which was in the middle of a clearing about 30 or 40 yards in diameter. At the gallows, as it proved to be, was another armed guard, who did not object to any of our sight-seeing desires and even affably answered our questions. He said that on 21 consecutive mornings 21 American soldiers had been marched to the gallows at sunrise, had been noosed and sent to another world. It sounded odd to us because we had not heard of American military punishment or execution being given in the form of hanging.

While at the gallows I utilized my little folding camera, bought in Paris, and asked a boy to take a picture of the party assembled on the gallows. He did and the picture I sent you is the one taken then, the negative of which I think I have now at my home.

Even in the United States, when I told people of the hangings which seem to have occurred eight months following the armistice, and as proof presented the photograph of the gallows, which I said would not have been constructed for nothing, many of the people here laughed and said I had experienced hallucinations.

In talking to a military police, who was a marine, after I had visited the gallows, he told me that what the guard at the gallows had said was true, and said also that a lieutenant colonel was awaiting his turn on the gallows. "Why a lieutenant colonel?" I asked. He then said that the officer had executed three soldiers without proper authority, and that later it was proven that the three men were not guilty of the alleged crime, the nature of which I did not learn.

The only surprise I experienced in hearing that story was the fact that the officer had been brought to trial and sentenced to hang. As for the three men, common soldiers, being done away with without proper conviction, I could easily conceive of that from the autocratic way in which officers in general treated enlisted men. If it was dark and you couldn't see an officer and inadvertently failed to salute him, you received particular ——. I even had such an incident to happen to me while at Camp Oglethorpe, Ga.

As for the dislike of American officers in France by enlisted men, it was general, and there were very few exceptions. They received pay sufficient to enable them to get good food and sleep in good quarters. At Decize, France, where I was first stationed in July, 1918, the food served us was intolerable, and I came near dying as a result of consuming, or trying to consume, it. If we could have received our pay immediately, or at the first of the month, as was promised us when we enlisted, we could very easily have gone to a French village and bought decent food. The case was, however, that when at Decize my pay and that of my comrades was held up because of delay in keeping the pay roll up with the movement of troops. At one time I received no pay for five months, and that happened to be during the spring of 1919, following the end of the war. Many soldiers were denied their pay for seven months; that I heard from many comrades; and many no doubt went without pay for a year.

When detailed to the Thirty-ninth—I believe—Division, in a little town near Bourges, in the spring of 1919, I was introduced to a good example of the American Army housing problem of the American soldiers. Men there died like fleas from influenza, caused by the bad housing of the common soldiers. My detail was quartered in an old mill which was full of cracks. The wind would come in at will, and one could hardly sleep from the cold drafts which would come up through the floor. It was in that town that hospital headquarters was located in an improvised building, the floor of which was Mother Earth.

If I remember correctly, the hospital beds there also rested on Mother Earth. When soldiers would die, they were carted to a small tent and there await their transportation to the grave. This particular tent had no floor except the earth, and often it was so crowded with dead soldiers that as many of the bodies rested in the open as in the tent. It was a sight I could never forget.

As an example of the nefarious and autocratic American Army system in France, one only has to say that American enlisted men were prohibited from going with American nurses and Red Cross women in general, which gave the officers, many of whom were complete ignoramuses, a monopoly on them.

I reenlisted for a year after being honorably discharged on July 15, 1919, at Camp Mills, Long Island, and volunteered for the Silesian expedition, which embarked for Germany from New York about October 18, 1919. I was a member of the Fiftieth Infantry; the Fifth Infantry, or part of it, also formed part of the expedition. Going over on the George Washington transport, I think it was the name, we got food which respectable people wouldn't feed to cats in America. In war time such was possibly permissible, because of the hurry, etc. But when such things were enacted almost one year after the end of the war, we soldiers naturally felt lumps in our throats and manufactured frowns on our faces.

The condition abroad was aggravated by the fact that the officers were eating oranges, cake, and ice cream. The enlisted men were receiving something which verged on slop. To top all, there was a lack of bread, or a disposition on the part of those in charge to refuse the enlisted man enough to live on.

The result was that a mutiny of the enlisted men almost took place. A body of despairing men broke open the hold where the food was kept and many oranges disappeared. It was necessary to place a double guard, armed to the limit, on the bakery, and every device to secure bread from the bakery was employed by the hungry men. Eventually there was a conference, and a slightly better brand of food was given out.

While stationed with a motor-truck company in the French barracks at Nievre, France, during November and December, 1918, a striking incident occurred during the former month. An officer of a supply company there was shot by a buck private, and the private immediately dispatched with his own life.

The story I received concerning the episode from the boy's comrades was that the boy had been detailed day after day for one year to work in the company's kitchen, which is the most disgusting work in the Army. In France we usually spent 14 hours of drudgery in a company kitchen, and when work was over we were tired out and very dirty. I heard that time and again the boy had appealed to his commander for a furlough and was always refused. Life in an Army kitchen in France was perfectly miserable, and so the boy called his officer to his quarters and told him that he was too sick to work that day. The officer told him to work anyway, and it was then that the boy killed his commander and then shot himself.

Prior to the shooting, I understand, the boy had gone on sick roll, but was told by the examining physician that he was not sick enough to stay on the roll. That was a common occurrence, and even in this country I have had temperature close to 100° and was yet forced to continue work. The latter happening took place in the spring of 1920 at Camp Dix, N. J., when I was in Company C, Forty-fifth Infantry.

Shortly after the shooting episode at Nievre, France, I had occasion to consider myself receiving unjust treatment. I went to the military headquarters and was there told that I would have very little chance of getting anything by bringing on a court-martial. I then besieged my commanding officer, told him that I considered I was being illtreated, and in one week I was, to my happiness, transferred to Bourges, France.

At Bourges, France, I was present when an officer got mad and cussed and swore at a sergeant. The latter was not daunted and threatened to have his officer court-martialed. The officer shut up, and the sergeant had better judgment than to try to bring conviction to an officer through the channel of court-martial.

Is it any wonder that an ex-enlisted man should dislike the Army system and the autocracy of the officers? If I can help it, I will not enter the American Army again.

Best wishes.

STATE OF FLORIDA, County of Hillsborough:

Before me, the undersigned authority, this day personally appeared Murray Gordon, who, being first duly sworn, deposes and says as follows: That on December 11, 1918, I was on furlough in Paris, France, and for some reason overstayed my furlough 48 hours. On my way to report back to my outfit I was arrested at the station and was sent to the prison Rue St. Aun, where the American provost marshal was stationed. While at that prison, where I spent four days, I have seen with my own eyes where men have been brought in at night and have been unmercifully beaten by different guards of the prison without any reason. We laid in those cells for 24 hours without any food. Amongst 24 of us that were in that room that night only 1 was charged with robbery, the rest of us were just absent without leave for a few hours or by missing trains that left Paris without having time enough to check out from the American provost marshal. I saw a man who was brought in the second day, and the second lieutenant, whose face I know but do not remember his name, tried to find out something from this man, and he brought him into a bathroom and threw him in the bathtub with his clothes and everything on, and we could hear his screams from our cell, which I saw was only about 50 yards away from there.

The next day we were transported to the Bastile prison, where I stayed almost two weeks. We were packed in a cell where, when the French Government used that prison, they only had two men, and they packed in 15 or 20 of us in that cell. While I stayed at that prison I saw where men have lined up on sick call and the officers told them to be sure they were sick or they'd make them sick. During my two weeks at that prison I saw every night men being clubbed, and I could hear their screams and yells all over the house. I was hit in the face myself in that prison because I didn't fall into the chow line fast enough to get my chow. My feet were swollen bad because I had my shoes on for almost three weeks; couldn't get any medical attention. When I walked out of that cell, walking lame, a marine pushed me and knocked me over; told me to snap it out.

From the Bastile prison I was sent to Shells, 25 kilometers from Paris, and stayed there until after Christmas. While President Wilson, on Christmas Day, was inspecting the American troops at Chaumont, where Gen. Pershing's headquarters were located, which town was only a little way from the prison camp, 500 men were walking around in that stockade without any leggings in mud knee-deep, shivering from the chill and cold and hungry; while the permanent party and officers were having a nice turkey dinner the men were picking pieces of bread and pieces of meat out of the garbage cans and eating it. I have also seen with my own eyes truck load after truck load of food and quartermaster's supplies which arrived at that prison and were unloaded at the permanent party's quarters, and men were starving, eating most anything they could get hold of, picking stuff up around the permanent party's quarters and eating it. A Young Men's Christian Association man attempted to issue some chocolates to the men on Christmas Day and he was stopped and not allowed to do so. I have also seen a man being abused by the guards and put in solitary confinement in a small pup tent in the mud, and in two hours afterwards this man cut his own throat, and when they took him out of the tent to take him to a hospital they allowed no man to go near that tent. I have also seen a sergeant major and two other sergeants who escaped at night and could not get away from that town. Guards were sent out to hunt them, and when they brought them back they put them in one of those little stables where the French owner of the building used to have his cows and hogs, and they sent in three or four men with clubs, and when those men were let out of these at chow time they were black and blue.

My record of those places is with the Adjutant General's Office, but I have true copies.

In another instance I have seen a young man of 16 years old who had been on sentry duty for 24 hours in a pouring rain, and there was a stack of hay out there on that prairie where a lot of men claimed there were Germans hiding; that young man that night fell asleep on the post and the corporal guard found him asleep and disarmed him and turned him in. This particular man stayed at the guardhouse for a couple of weeks. According to Army regulations in war time his sentence carried death. He never had a court martial at that post and he disappeared suddenly and no one has ever heard from him since. His own cousin, who remained with the outfit, has never heard from him, and we did hear some rumors going around the outfit that his mother, who lived at San Francisco, had appealed to the President in his behalf.

In an affidavit I can not give details of everything that I have seen and know, but if necessary I am willing to appear personally and do so, and if necessary will bring all letters and papers which I have received from the Adjutant General and copies of my prison records to Washington.

MURRAY GORDON.

Hon. T. WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: You will kindly pardon me for encroaching upon your valuable time through this letter. Really I wished to speak to you personally yesterday; on account of the present crisis, I am forced to attend my work in order not to lose my position.

For about two years I was an operative of the division of criminal investigations, provost marshal department, with the American Forces in Germany, first as an enlisted man, afterwards as a civilian employee.

Most esteemed sir, I believe to be one of the few "innocents" who really knows about the scandalous behavior and dishonesty that prevailed among some of our so-called high-ranking and distinguished officers, and I do not believe that they are courageous enough to challenge anyone. I investigated personally the famous "liquidation commission graft," the 31 stolen railroad cars with American Red Cross supplies, the Bergdoll case, and many others. Ordinarily when some high official seemed to be implicated in any of the investigations an order came to drop the case, and very frequently the files disappeared. In case of necessity, I can furnish enough evidence to substantiate my statements.

Esteemed sir, in closing I would ask again your forgiveness for having infringed upon your valuable time.

With assurances of my profoundest esteem, I beg to remain,

Your most obedient servant,

LAWRENCEVILLE, GA., November 5, 1921.

I have seen Otis, Jule, and Pudoo about the soldier killed in France without a trial. That took place before they reached there, but they heard about it immediately. They tell me that Louis Goldberg, of No. 18 Banks Street, Paterson, N. J., saw the occurrence and can give you valuable information and names of others who witnessed it.

The young man who was killed was a conscientious objector and refused to carry a gun and pack, but was willing, as I understand, to do anything else. Lieut. Tracy tried to make him take it, and he refused, and was slapped by the lieutenant, who then sent a sergeant down to make the soldier take gun and pack, but he would not do so, and the sergeant thrust a bayonet through him, killing him. The sergeant was bumped off in first battle. Lieut Tracy is still living, so far as I can find out. If you still want affidavits from Otis, Jule, and Pudoo, let me know and I will send them.

THE BRICKYARD AT NOYERS.

FEBRUARY 20, 1919.

I read with interest the article written in regard to St. Aignan. I must confess it is a fair interpretation of conditions at the camp; in fact, it is the first article that I have read that appeared unbiased. That an investigation into minute details was conducted is evident to one who has been through "the mill," and careful effort has been made to ascertain facts in regard to this celebrated "mud hole."

During the investigation two places were overlooked, just outside of the main camp, in the village of Noyers, about, I believe, 2 kilometers from St. Aignan. This village is used as a billeting area for troops destined to be returned to the States. One reaches this village only after going through "the mill" and while awaiting arrival of records from central record office.

It is evident that the investigator has not heard of the celebrated "brickyard" at Noyers. Hundreds of men know the place; have lived in it—I mean, rather, were forced to live in it. Not to mention this place in the article leads me to believe that the investigator saw and visited such places as the camp authorities wanted him to visit. Investigators in France invariably see the best, not that they do not desire to see the dregs as well, yet some officer is usually at hand to "steer" them in the proper channels. I have witnessed investigations.

If while on the road adjacent to the railroad the investigators had continued until they reached the church in Noyers, they would have been abreast of an open yard facing the left side of the road. It is the home of the famous brickyard. As far as I could determine, the two buildings in use were part of a farm; the buildings are long, narrow, and two stories high. The yard was a sea of mud. In this billeting area, which was or is officially known as area 2, section 3, housing about 400 men or over, are casuals, discharged from hospitals as unfit for present duty and awaiting shipment home.

I arrived at this domicile about 7 p. m. one evening in company with several other men. We were ordered to find our own quarters in this area. We, my "bunkie" and I, located in the ground floor of one of the buildings. This building was the filthiest hole I was ever forced to live in, and that's a broad statement considering sanitation in France. We entered the lower floor through a hole in the wall, walking in mud up to our shoe tops. Small pools of urine and fecal matter were present outside of this entrance.

As I stepped down into this room—or "hole," I should say—four men were playing cards by candle light. Every available inch of space had apparently been occupied. One of the men playing cards I recognized as being from my division. "Any roomr in here for two fellows?" I asked. "Yes; I guess we can make room for two," was the reply. Pointing to two bedticks, he informed us that we could use that space and the straw ticks.

The entire floor was covered with ticks, some filled with straw, others without. The ticks were lying in rows, one alongside the other. There was barely enough room for a man to walk to his bunk without treading on some other fellow's bunk. The floor consisted of dirt, not clean earth, but moldy, filthy dirt, which contained vermin of many years' habitation, which the mere superficial scraping of a broom could not remove. The walls were covered with cobwebs; sunshine never penetrated the lower portion of this building. The light seeped in through cracks. Some parts of the room were in continuous darkness. There were no facilities for heating the place. Another feature was the dirt. After one had rolled up on the tick for the night a constant stream of dirt seeped through the crevices in the floor above. An occupant upstairs left a trail of dirt as he walked across the floor to his tick. In the morning the eyes of my "bunkie" and my own would be filled with dirt. Our blankets were covered with it. The dampness and darkness was depressing, light being only furnished by candles. Nearly 200 men lived for weeks in this hole. The rest were billeted in another building under similar conditions.

I passed through the delousing process and emerged with new clothing. After occupying this "hole" for two days I, at my own request, revisited the delousing plant for a bath, as my body and clothes needed cleansing to prevent spread of "cooties."

One evening about 9.30 two officers visited the place, evidently on inspection. "Any 'cooties' down here, boys?" was asked. There was a chorus of ayes. Twenty minutes before the officers appeared, one fellow had picked 42 "cooties" off his undershirt. He informed the officers, who replied that it was a hell of a hole to keep men in. One was compelled to stay within or outside the building at all times, because of the possibility of one's name being called to join a company to be returned home. The men, being eager to go home, remained within the limits at all times. If you were absent when your name was called, you were "out of luck"—you didn't go. My "bunkie" and I so arranged matters that one of us was on the watch at all times. Our food was good and wholesome and we usually received plenty, even though we were compelled to wait an hour or two to get it. At 4 p. m. roll call was held, usually 6 p. m. one finished supper, which means that we stood two hours "down the alley."

Our sleeping billets were the worst I have ever been forced to sleep in. They were filthy and rotten and a disgrace to the Army. Moreover, they were an insult to the men, nearly all of whom had done their "bit" at the front, been in a hospital, and were then sent to such a hole.

There are no excuses for the place—nothing but dynamite could eradicate the filth. There is plenty of acreage near this town upon which tents or barracks could be erected. It has been accomplished at other towns. Plenty of labor was available. I shall never forget the two weeks I was forced to live there, nor will several hundred others. Some had lived there six weeks. It is a black mark against the Army. It is the only complaint I make, because I consider it inexcusable that men be forced to live there.

My experiences in the "hole" occurred in December. In the latter part of that month I was ordered into a casual company at St. Aignan and placed in command as first sergeant until officers were assigned. It might interest you to know that I had 150 men. We placed 10 men in the Sibley tents. I went to the supply officer and the best he could furnish me with was 4 stoves for 15 tents. Very little coal or wood were obtainable. Some days none was available. The officers were sorry, but the situation was beyond them. On Christmas day for dinner, in company with several thousand others, I received a small portion of burned corned beef, some potato-water gravy, one slice of bread, no coffee. I waited over an hour to get this, standing in mud shoe-top deep. I was very glad to get that meal. I mention this because, according to some printed descriptions, people assume that we were served in a cafeteria. It is not a complaint on my part; it is a statement of facts.

There are hundreds of men in New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia who were initiated into the filth at the "brickyard" and who remained silent, fearing that complaint would endanger their chances of getting home. No doubt it would; so nobody made the complaint.

HANFORD, CALIF., November 1, 1921.

DEAR FRIEND: This evening when I returned home I picked up the evening paper and the first thing I saw was an article about the hanging of soldiers in France, and what drew my attention so much was when you mentioned "Hard Boiled" Smith's name, as I had the great unnecessary pleasure of spending a few weeks as a prisoner under him at Camp No. 1.

When you said he was never punished enough you were quite right.

I can give you the names of four other men who were at that time in my company; also fell in the clutches of Hard Boiled Smith, or, as he termed himself, "the guy mid der hard knuckles."

You will note I started this letter "Dear friend." Anyone saying Smith was never punished enough and is willing now to go after him surely is a friend of mine.

I can give you all the information I know about him if you wish—how I got into his prison camp and how I got out with 35 others from my regiment of Twenty-third Engineers, of whom Col. Kerr was in command.

If you desire any information, kindly let me know.

Yours, respectfully,

——— ———.

NOVEMBER 6, 1921.

HONORABLE SIR: I understand several former officers disagree with you about hangings in Gievres, France, or that they have seen any gallows anywhere in this camp. Personally I have not seen any gallows or heard about shootings or hangings at that place, as I served there only till April 10, 1919.

A former private of Company A, Thirty-fourth Regiment Engineers, who served there with the rest of his company till July, 1919, told me that one Sunday in May or June, 1919, they all had a treat to see a gallows in the military prison in Gievres.

I can furnish you with facts about a soldier by the name of Kendricks, of Company A, Thirty-fourth Engineers, who took sick one day in October, 1918, was examined by Capt. Sabin, medical officer of the regiment. The captain marked him "Duty," which meant healthy enough to work in the railroad yard loading cars. This poor boy felt too weak, so he asked Capt. Smith, commander of the company, to let him stay in the barrack. The latter gave him the permission, but the poor boy died on the same day of pneumonia. This Capt. Sabin wanted to be very patriotic, and the only way he could serve his country best was to accuse the men of being malingerers—trying to dodge duty.

There were at least two more victims in the regiment who paid with their lives on account of not receiving proper medical attention from this captain or any of his assistants.

I am confident that any enlisted man, including the top sergeant, will gladly corroborate my statements about this poor boy Kendricks.

Yours, very respectfully, ——— ———.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move to strike out in the pending amendment the words "requested and required." Those words, as I remember, were suggested by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and accepted by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and are now a part of the perfected amendment. I move to strike those words out and to substitute therefor the words "authorized and directed," as those are the usual words employed.

I will address myself for a few moments to that amendment, and I trust that I will be able to prevail upon the Senator from North Carolina to accept the suggestion.

I want to say, just preliminary to that, Mr. President, that I deprecate the application of the word "bonus" to the bill that is designed to compensate the soldiers. I deprecate the term which has been embodied in the bill itself, "adjusted compensation." I believe it should be entitled "A bill to provide a measure of just compensation," and I think that there is ample precedent in the prompt action of other countries for our doing at least as much for our soldiers as is provided for in the amendment under consideration.

Canada did not wait two or three years after the war was over in order to deal justly by her soldiers. She provided some measure of justice at the outset of the struggle.

On the 7th of September, 1917, the Senator from Georgia (Mr. Hardwick) offered an amendment to the revenue bill then pending providing a 10 per cent additional tax upon all incomes over $25,000, the proceeds thereof to be devoted to paying additional compensation to soldiers of $50 per month. It was computed by experts at the time that such a tax would yield $194,000,000 in revenue, and that the amount required to pay $50 per month additional to the soldiers would be $155,000,000 for the year 1917.

Mr. President, that amendment, proposed by the Senator from Georgia on the 7th day of September, was offered by him at my suggestion. I had prepared the amendment. It succeeded in obtaining five votes in the Senate.

What was Canada doing for her soldiers right at that time? Canada at that time was paying $33 a month to her soldiers. In addition to that she was providing life insurance. She did not take the premium payment or any part of the premium payment from the pay of the soldiers. She provided for the payment of the premiums by municipal levies. In addition to that Canada provided a patriotic fund for taking care of the families of soldiers. That patriotic fund was called the Canadian patriotic fund. It was created in the first place by voluntary contributions and augmented by province and municipal levies. The several funds and allowances provided by Canada for her soldiers from the beginning of the war were sufficient to provide $65 per month to the family of a private soldier with three children.

We have waited and delayed; we have argued back and forth about the source from which to derive the money to pay this additional compensation to the soldiers of our country.

Mr. President, although my own State voted a bonus to the soldiers, they have had the wisdom to make those who profited out of the war pay that bonus by taking it out of the surtaxes.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope my friend from Wisconsin will not forget that Canada has already given more than 4,000,000 acres of land to the ex-service men.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that fact.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] the other evening cited the splended record made by the wealthier States of the country in taking care of their soldiers as an accomplishment of the Republican Party. He seems to think tha. relieved the Federal Government and the party in control from its responsibility to have enacted such legislation. I can not agree with that conclusion. I do not feel that it reflects any credit upon the Republican Party that such action was made necessary by the failure of the Federal Government to enact this legislation. It is to the credit of the States that they should have come to the aid of the soldiers, but to my mind it is rather an indictment of the Congress of the United States and the political party in control of the Government that this matter of justice to the soldiers should have been so long deferred that the States felt it incumbent upon them to tax the people of their respective Commonwealths in order to pay to the service men an added compensation which it was the plain duty of the Federal Government to do.

The picture which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] so eloquently presented on the floor of the Senate Saturday evening is typical of the situation among the veterar : of the late war in every State in the Union.

Mr. President, I now desire to address myself for a few moments to the attitude of the Republican Party and the administration toward this particular legislation, and by that I mean, of course, the measure known as the adjusted compensation bill. If there is any meaning to be attached at all to the words used by the President of the United States when he, as I contend, so improperly intruded himself into the debates of the Senate in opposition to the adjusted compensation bill, then pending, it is that he does not recognize any obligation upon the part of the Government to provide any additional compensation for our soldiers. In the speech which the President delivered in the Senate for the purpose of defeating the adjusted compensation bill he made it perfectly plain that he does not believe that the Government owes anything to the soldiers of the country; that there is any obligation to be discharged; that the soldiers are entitled as a matter of right to compensation which will in some measure put them on an equal footing with those who remained at home and enjoyed the opportunities which were offered to those in civil life during those years. He said in plain English——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator's time on the amendment has expired. Does he wish to be recognized on the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Has it expired on my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina? If it has I desire to be recognized upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time on his own amendment has expired, but he is now recognized on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I shall pause for a vote on my amendment now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the original amendment to my amendment was offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and I accepted it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin and I concur in that, so I will accept his amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, if I can be recognized, I should like to speak for 10 minutes on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is now recognized for 10 minutes on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I was just saying that it was perfectly plain from the language used by the President when he came into the debate on the bonus bill on the 12th day of last July that he does not consider that our Government owes any additional compensation to the soldiers as a matter of right—as an obligation which the Government should recognize. His attitude, as plainly indicated by the language of his address, is, that if we do anything for the soldiers we do it as a gratuity, we do it as a favor. He said:

> In a personal as well as a public manner, which ought to be a plight of good faith, I have commended the policy of generous treatment of the Nation's defenders, not as a part of any contract, not as the payment of a debt which is owing, but as a mark of the Nation's gratitude. Every obligation is to the disabled and dependent.

No obligation to men unless they are disabled and dependent! Then he further said:

> In such reference as has been made to general compensation there has been a reservation as to the earliest consistent time for such action if it is taken. Even without such reservation, however, a modified view would be wholly justifiable at the present moment, because the enactment of the compensation bill in the midst of the struggle for readjustment and restoration would hinder every effort and greatly imperil the financial stability of our country. More, this menacing effort to expend billions in gratuities will imperil our capacity to discharge our FIRST OBLIGATIONS TO THOSE WE MUST NOT FAIL TO AID.

What are the obligations? To reduce taxes? How to reduce taxes? This bill is an expression of what was in the President's mind and what was in his Secretary's mind—to reduce taxes by cutting down the taxes upon the incomes of the very rich and by taking off the taxes from the profiteers. That, he said, is our first obligation.

I deny that, Mr. President. I say that our first obligation is to pay just compensation to the soldiers. I say that it should be paid out of the war profits and not out of the general taxes. That is where our first obligation rests. Why, Mr. President, talk about an obligation to relieve the rich from taxes; we never made the corporations, we never made the owners of great incomes pay appropriately under any of the war taxation measures which we adopted. We levied a tax in 1917 of 33 per cent on war profits. Great Britain that same year imposed a tax of 80 per cent on war profits. In 1918 we raised that tax to 48 per cent on war profits, and England maintained her tax at 80 per cent. We have continued our tax upon excess profits which has averaged about 48 per cent down to the present time. England has held hers steadily at 80 per cent. We are advised now that she has repealed her war-profits tax. I have been given contradictory statements upon that proposition. One would hardly believe that it is so difficult to get at the facts, but if England has repealed her excess-profits tax, then it is absolutely certain that she has put, not a 15 per cent tax on her corporations, as we propose, but a 30 per cent tax on her corporations. In other words, she has taxed the owners of great incomes, the great war profiteers, the holders of large estates when they are transmitted through inheritance to others, from twice to three times as much as we have taxed the wealth of this country, and with that example before us, we have the President breaking into the debates in the Senate with a speech in which he declares that our first obligation is to take off the war-profits tax from the war profiteers before we can appropriate money to more adequately compensate our soldiers for their great sacrifices.

Mr. President, there has been a good deal of talk in the course of these debates about the small amount of money that many of these corporations make. That does not take into account the fact that by the very terms of the legislation which we have had on the statute books since we enacted the first war revenue bill they could charge off against expenses, against amortization, against depreciation, unlimited sums. I have here in my notes the fact that one of the corporations that I looked up particularly, the American Metal Co., paid over $300,000,000 as a salary to the president of the company, and the law permitted them to do it. Of course, we provide in the law that if the internal-revenue collector believes that corporations are charging up too much to expenses he can disallow the deduction, but everybody knew when we wrote that into the law that it would be a dead letter; that it could not be enforced; that it would be impossible for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to examine the accounts of all the corporations. There are three or four hundred thousand of these corporations paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars for salaries and countless items of expenses, with all the details of depreciation, how would it be possible for the Internal Revenue Commissioner to pass upon such matters?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin said $300,000,000 salary. Did he mean that or did he intend to say $300,000?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I meant to say $300,000. I misspoke myself.

Mr. PENROSE. It does not make any difference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It does make a difference. It would not to you, but I want to be accurate. I thank the Senator from Iowa for the correction. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rules of the Senate require the galleries to remain silent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How much time have I left, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will manage to be heard again on some other amendment.

Mr. President, what I want to say is this: I do not believe that we have lost permanently the struggle to make the war profiteer bear the burden of this obligation to the ex-service men. We may see it defeated in the Senate to-day, but it shall be a living issue before the country; it may be revived at any time. We shall come back to it again and again in legislation until, Mr. President, some measure of justice shall be done.

But we have lost the battle to make these war profiteers pay this measure of justice to the soldiers for the moment, and, because I believe that the next best source from which to pay that debt is from the interest due us on our foreign loans, I shall support the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. President, I will fight with all the power that there is in me before we shall be finally driven, according to the manifest plan as announced by Congressman FORDNEY, as foreshadowed by Mellon, and, I think, as plainly to be deduced from the President's own words, to load onto the people of this country a sales tax, out of which shall be paid just compensation to the soldiers of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] to my amendment.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] as modified. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The READING CLERK. On page 7, after line 7, it is proposed to insert the following:

(c) That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, directed, and instructed at the earliest practicable moment to secure from the several foreign Governments, namely, Belgium, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Liberia, Rumania, Russia, and Serbia, to which Governments moneys were loaned by the United States, under and by virtue of several war emergency acts of Congress, passed in the years 1917 and 1918, long-time interest-bearing bonds of such Governments as provided in said acts, the interest on such bonds to be paid by said Governments semiannually at rates not less than those fixed in said acts.

That in making settlements with the several foreign Governments aforesaid the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to take interest-bearing bonds for the past-due interest on said loans and the future interest up to January 1, 1922, such bonds to be of like tenor and effect as the bonds for the principal loaned to said Governments, and the interest thereon to be paid semiannually in like manner.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure from such foreign Governments as may be indebted to the United States, bonds of like tenor and effect and of like rates of interest and payable in like manner, for the following indebtedness: (1) Obligations received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war material; (2) obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation; (3) obligations received by the Treasurer from the American relief administration; (4) obligations due the United States or any other account from such foreign nations.

The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure bonds, of like tenor and effect and like rates of interest, for the indebtedness due the United States from the following nations: Armenia, Austria, Esthonia, Finland, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, and Poland.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept, in addition to said bonds, any securities from such foreign Government as collaterial and as a guaranty of the prompt payment of said bonds and interest thereon.

That of said bonds the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart $2,000,000,000 in amount thereof to be used in the payment of a bonus to the soldiers of the late war with Germany, under such conditions as the Congress may hereafter direct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, on Saturday I discussed at some length this amendment. I will only shortly state again the substance of what I then said.

The amendment provides for the taking by the Secretary of the Treasury of bonds for all the indebtedness owed by our allies to us under the provisions of the acts of 1917 and 1918. In other words, it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to take bonds under the contract that we have already made by Congress with these foreign nations—nothing more and nothing less. In my judgment there can be no fairer way than to perform our part of the contract, and it can not be unfair or unjust to insist that our foreign allies perform their part of the contract under which this money was loaned to them. There will be a little more than $11,000,000,000 of these bonds. There was something over nine billions to begin with, but principal and interest up to January 1, 1922, will amount to enough to bring up the total to $11,000,000,000; and then I provide, as to two billions of these bonds, as follows:

That of said bonds the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart $2,000,000,000 in amount thereof to be used in the payment of a bonus to the soldiers of the late war with Germany under such conditions as the Congress may hereafter direct—

That is to say, under the McCumber bill, if the Finance Committee and the majority of the Senate provide that that bill shall go through, then the amendment merely directs the paying of the bonus out of this $2,000,000,000 of bonds. It furnishes an ample amount. It will not impose taxation upon the American people. It simply provides that we are to collect what is honestly due us. There is no better way in which this compensation to the soldiers can be paid. The ex-service men will be satisfied with it. The bonds taken, indorsed by the United States, will be worth dollar for dollar, as we all know, and perhaps a premium. Surely nothing could be more fitting than that just two-elevenths of this indebtedness, just two billions out of the eleven billions, shall be devoted to the payment of the soldiers who made such sacrifices and who made such a contract possible.

Our soldiers served and saved the nations of Europe who were allied with us. If this Congress takes $2,000,000,000 of those bonds given for that indebtedness by which we helped to save them and puts it in the hands of the soldiers, there can not be a doubt on earth that every single nation that owes us the bonds will pay the interest as and when it falls due and will pay the principal at maturity. They would never hesitate for a moment when they know even a part of it goes to our soldiers who went 3,000 miles to fight for them. In my judgment there can not be any better way or any fairer way to deal with our allies than upon the terms under which we have already contracted to deal with them, and then there can not be any fairer or any more just way to deal with the ex-soldiers themselves than to give them this adjusted compensation out of the money, or a part of the money—a very small part, comparatively—of the money that we owe to them. Surely the majority is willing to give them a promise about it. Surely they are willing to set apart $2,000,000,000 in these bonds for the benefit of the soldiers. Up to date they have not had even a promise. Now, you surely will be willing to give these soldiers a promise of something definite. That is all this amendment does. It sets aside $2,000,000,000 of that indebtedness and makes it a trust fund out of which to pay a compensation to the American soldiers under conditions to be hereafter named by you. You name your own terms. All that this amendment does is to make sure the bonds will be forthcoming.

I do not believe there is a taxpayer in this country of large or small degree who would not confirm a plan of this sort. There can not be any objection to it. The difference between it and the Simmons plan is that we take the whole step at once; we pay in bonds instead of paying the cash as collected from interest. There may be some doubt about whether all the interest will be paid the first year, but there can not be any doubt about it if you will pay over to the soldiers the bonds as provided in this amendment.

I have already explained the matter fully. I do not intend to go over the argument that I made on Saturday. I simply ask for a yea-and-nay vote when the other Senators are through speaking.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the bill to regulate the refunding of the foreign debt was reported by me from the Finance Committee of the Senate on August 20 last. The minority party, to which the Senator who has just spoken belongs, has persistently obstructed the taking up of that measure for consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PENROSE. After the remarkable effrontery displayed in the statement just made I do not feel disposed to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, the Senator can characterize what I have said as effrontery, but when he does so he does himself a great injustice, and I greatly regret to hear a Senator on this floor perform in any such way.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, on August 20 last, in the discharge of my duty and at the request of the Treasury Department, after a consideration of some time in the committee and after taking the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury and others, with the minority members of the committee present and being afforded a full opportunity to be heard, the bill was reported, with one amendment. Not only have the minority party in this Chamber, to which the Senator who has just taken his seat belongs, prevented my getting this measure up for consideration, but they have prevented its coming up even for the purpose of offering amendments to have it safeguarded more thoroughly, if in their opinion it required it, or to devote the funds which might accrue from the collection of these debts to any purpose for which they could command a majority of votes in this body. Only now, at the last moment, in connection with a revenue measure with which this proposition has no connection, for pure purposes of demagogism, in my opinion at least, they intrude this issue upon the Senate and the country.

I make the charge, Mr. President, without any hesitation, because the facts bear me out in the statement which I make. Since August 20 the measure on which the Senator now expatiates in such glowing terms has been prevented by him and by those with whom he is associated from seeing the light of day even for consideration.

Had this bill become a law, as it might easily have become, and the Secretary of the Treasury, with such safeguards as a majority in this Chamber and in the House have seen fit to surround it, been authorized as provided in the bill, this money might be on its way now toward our shores, to be available in the Treasury of the United States for such purposes as Congress might determine; but the Senator from Tennessee and his party have prevented, have delayed, have obstructed, have entirely rendered impossible the beginning of the most ordinary negotiations toward collecting the money justly due the United States, of which the majority was making every effort to secure the prompt payment. Had that money now, or even part of it, been in the Treasury of the United States, as well it might have been, it might have been available had a majority of this Chamber determined upon a suitable occasion to apply it to the necessities of the soldiers or to any other purpose; and I can not see any logic or any but the shallowest and most transparent reasoning in the statements just made by the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am surprised at the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I fear he has not measured his words. To rise in this Chamber and claim that the minority Members of this body are responsible for the delay in action upon the refunding loan bill is preposterous and absurd.

True, the measure was reported to this body late in August; but I challenge the Senator from Pennsylvania to state a day and a time when he ever rose in his place and moved that this bill be taken up for consideration in this body.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the fact that I did not formally request consideration of the measure was due to the fact that I knew the absolute futility of it. Without mentioning names, members of the Senator's own party informed me that the bill could not be brought up at that time, and the RECORD will show that days have been occupied here in prolix speeches, arriving nowhere, upon this measure in order to delay its consideration or utilize it as a vehicle to delay other measures pending before this body.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there is no question but that the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania would give the impression to this country that the minority Members of this body have held up that bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Which they have.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They have never had an opportunity to debate it or to discuss it, because the Senator from Pennsylvania, in charge of it, has never laid it properly and in the usual manner before the Senate. Everyone here knows that the order in which bills are discussed here and moved for final decision rests entirely with the majority party. Six members of that committee have filed a minority report to the refunding bill. It is one of the most bitterly contested questions before the Senate. Immediately upon its presentation by the committee a recess of the Senate was taken for three weeks, with many votes of Senators upon this side opposing that recess; and when we returned here this revenue bill, the Panama tolls bill, and the foreign treaties were placed before us, and there has not been an hour's delay in the discussion of these measures. I deny the allegation as a Member of the minority, that in any manner, any way, or any shape has the minority been responsible for delaying action upon the so-called refunding bill; but the responsibility is on the Republicans for delaying action in the committee and in delaying action upon this floor on that measure. The reason why the refunding loan bill has not been acted on is because of inaction, and inaction is not chargeable to a minority in a legislative body.

You have the votes to control legislation. You control a majority of this body. You are responsible for the legislation passed here. You could have kept us here those three weeks. You could have kept us here nights. You could have kept us here many hours during all this time and fought this issue out if you really wanted to pass that measure before this revenue bill was taken up.

I repeat, I am surprised that the Senator from Pennsylvania should suggest or intimate, indirectly or remotely, as to a measure that has never been called up here for action, and never has there been a word said in its favor on the floor, that the minority here is responsible for the delay or for procrastination. Whatever may be said about delay on other measures or prolonged speeches does not constitute an answer to the allegation made here that this measure has been held up or has been blocked from being long ago enacted into law because the Democratic minority Members have attended to their duties, have debated and discussed public questions that came before them, while the Senator from Pennsylvania has never moved to take from the calendar this very important measure.

Mr. PENROSE and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield? And if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it is quite evident that the suggestion that a bill involving the enormous sum of $11,000,000,000, more or less, due the United States, was delayed by the factious and demagogic opposition of the minority, has at last gotten under the hides of some gentlemen, and I am glad to know that at last a realization is evident of the heinous character of the course pursued to the detriment of the interests of the country. I make that statement because the record bears it out. The contents of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are swollen with long, idle speeches on this funding bill. I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he, and whether his party, will join me in agreeing to-day to fix a day for a vote upon the funding bill or to consider it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will be generous enough to state that I have not consumed time on this floor in prolonged debate.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has been in bad company.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have been much interested in this bill, and have suggested some amendments which I hoped would assist somewhat in perfecting it. I want to say to the Senator that I shall be glad to help to expedite the passage of this bill and to get speedy votes upon every amendment offered, but I shall not agree to any hour or any time which would mean the limiting of debate, or limiting beyond 10 minutes the debate by each Member on every amendment offered to this revenue bill.

I think that in the closing hours of this long debate every amendment should be fully discussed; there ought to be free debate and there ought to be a record vote on every amendment. The American people have a right to a decision from their Congress. They have a right to have every question discussed fully and voted upon, and if we can not do it to-night we can do it to-morrow, and if we can not do it to-morrow we can do it the next day. I say to the Senator that I will cooperate with him fully to expedite the consideration of this bill, as I have done from the first day this measure came before the Senate, and assist him in hastening debate and reaching votes on pending amendments.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator's conscience reproaches him unnecessarily. What I asked him was——

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. In whose time is the Senator from Pennsylvania speaking?

Mr. PENROSE. I believe I have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania, having spoken once, is not entitled to the floor in his own right.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rose to make an inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator rose to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to address an inquiry to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. McKELLAR. I object, unless it is taken out of the Senator's own time.

Mr. PENROSE. That can be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will take my own time and I will relieve the Senator from having charged to him the time that may be consumed in answering his questions.

Mr. PENROSE. I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he will help me to have a motion agreed to, after the disposal of the revenue revision measure, to make the debt funding bill the unfinished business? Then we can give the proceeds to the soldiers, or use the money for any other purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the majority Members on the other side of the Chamber decide that the most pressing measure before the American people is the refunding bill, I shall agree to do my part to have it brought up, to have the discussion commenced, and to bring the matter to a speedy adjudication. If there is any criticism of the Congress that is justifiable, in my opinion, it is that we dilly and dally and waste our time and do not get decisions on the petitions of our people for redress. My conception of the Congress is that it is a court of the people, where matters are brought which can not be tried in our courts of justice. I believe in calendars in courts, and I believe in calling the calendar, hearing the issues, and rendering decisions upon them. I do not care, so far as I am concerned, if every amendment is voted down, but I do believe in action, in decision, and the one criticism of the American Congress to-day that is undermining its influence is as to its lack of decision on public questions.

Mr. PENROSE. I am glad to have the Senator's promise to help expedite this and other measures, and I shall avail myself of his good intentions at an early date and at every opportunity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to occupy some of my time on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to say simply this, that I was never more astounded than at the characterization made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It is unjustified by any facts which appear in this record. His committee reported out the refunding bill just before the recess, and he did not call it up. He has had the tax bill up, and he has not brought the bond refunding bill up at all. The record shows he has not brought it up. He has not attempted to get it up, and it would have been silly for him to have attempted to get it up, because he has had the tax bill before us for nearly seven weeks, and he could not have displaced the tax bill, and he has not tried to displace the tax bill. Therefore his statements are entirely unsupported by anything which appears in the record, and the statements made by him are not founded on any facts in or out of the record.

I do not blame the Senator from Pennsylvania very much, because he has not been here a great deal of the time. He has not kept up with this tax bill, much less with the refunding bill. It is his misfortune, perhaps, but he is not cognizant of the facts in the case and he should not make these wholly unwarranted statements.

He said this amendment had just been brought in. This amendment has been pending for weeks. If the Senator had kept up with the tax bill and the amendments thereto as he should have, if he had been in the Chamber as he should have, if he had given it any consideration as he should have as a legislator, he would not have made those statements. They are wholly without foundation.

This amendment has been debated, though not a great deal, and the Senator knows I never take up much time of the Senate on any matter. So far as his characterization of this amendment as being a matter of "effrontery" is concerned, I just say it is wholly without warrant of any kind, nature, or description, and wholly unbecoming the Senator from Pennsylvania to make it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania made a blanket charge, which included every Member of the minority, that the action of the minority was demagoguery. He characterized everything which the minority membership have been doing with that term. I say in all sincerity to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I believe his remark was unworthy of him. I can not feel that it is in keeping with the ordinary courtesy and consideration of the distinguished Senator.

In the first place, this bill, when it came before the Senate came without any explanation. The chairman of the Finance Committee made no explanation of this most important measure, a measure containing provisions which would affect seriously a great many people of the United States. After the bill came before the Senate, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania offered about 75 amendments to the bill, without explanation.

I have listened to the debate on this measure, and I have yet to point to anything which could be considered in the nature of a desire to delay the final action upon the bill. The debate has necessarily been extended, because the provisions of the bill are so numerous and so far-reaching in their importance. I simply want in this simple statement to resent the remark of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, we have listened to a very remarkable statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. He said that if the refunding bill had been acted on it might have been passed, and if it had been passed the money might now have been on the way to the United States, and some of it might have been used, after it arrived, to make a payment to the soldiers.

> Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
> The saddest are these: "It might have been."

Let us talk about what can be now. We have offered you three concrete and feasible plans for paying this soldiers' adjusted compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Alabama and the Senate to the fact that the so-called refunding bill was introduced on June 21; it was reported on August 19, just five days before we took a recess. It was not brought up by him in these five days. We stood in recess until September 21, 1921, and on reassembling immediately took up the tax bill and other bills which had preference over the funding bill. At any rate the Senator did not bring up this bill or attempt to. I call the Senate's attention to the fact that not only has the Senator from Pennsylvania not been active himself, allowing practically two months to elapse before he reported the bill, keeping it before his committee two months, but he reported it out just as we were about to take a recess, and has made no effort to get it up. If it is as important a bill as he says it is, he has been guilty of the grossest kind of negligence in not calling it up, and if he wanted to use the collections of interest for a soldiers' fund, as he now claims he does, he has been grossly negligent of the soldiers' interests in not trying to get it for them.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my friend from Tennessee for his suggestion.

Mr. President, there is nothing in the way to prevent foreign countries from paying us this money now. There is due this Government now between $1,000,000,000 and $1,400,000,000 of interest upon this debt, and the Senator from Pennsylvania can not hide behind the fact that we have not passed the bill which has come over from the House recently.

What does that bill provide? It provides for the appointment of a commission to take up this whole foreign indebtedness matter, to adjust it; it can wipe the debt out, if it chooses, and then come back and say to the American people, "We have decided to cancel this debt of foreign countries, and we decided not to collect a dollar of interest. We have excused the indebtedness."

The Senator from Pennsylvania asks us to give power to a commission headed by the Secretary of the Treasury, a man who has been criticized and condemned recently by the American Legion, composed in part of soldiers whose heroic courage saved that flag from defeat in the hour of the Nation's peril.

We are asked to give power to this commission which would permit it to say to the foreign countries we present to you this money or indebtedness with our compliments.

Mr. President, I have seen the Republican Party vote down an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] which sought to pay this adjusted compensation out of excess-profits taxes.

I saw them to-day with their votes put to death an amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina as amended by myself a provision which made certain the payment of this debt to our soldiers without taxing the people of the United States one 5-cent piece. I am going to see you in a moment vote down an amendment of the Senator from Tennessee which provides for the acquirement of the bonds of foreign countries and using them to obtain the money to pay this indebtedness to our soldiers, 500,000 of whom are out of employment, while we are asking for them justice here to-day.

Senators, if you continue this treatment how do you expect the soldier to believe that you are his friend? How do you expect the American people to believe that you are the friend of the American soldier? We will not judge you by what you tell us. The Bible says, "By their fruits ye shall know them." You voted down the excess-profits plan. That is one. You voted down the foreign indebtedness interest plan. That is two. You are going to vote down the bond plan of the Senator from Tennessee. That is three. And next fall at the polls it will be with you and ought to be "three strikes and out."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MCKELLAR (when Mr. CARAWAY's name was called). The junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is detained at home by illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY]. I will let this announcement stand for the day. If the junior Senator from Arkansas were present, he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before regarding the transfer of my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. In his absence, being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last ballot with reference to my pair and its transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MCKINLEY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. If present, the Senator from Nebraska would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. MCKELLAR's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 21, line 2, after the comma insert "or stock or shares in a corporation," so that if amended it will read:

> The term "capital assets" as used in this section includes property acquired and held by the taxpayer for profit or investment (whether or not connected with his trade or business), but does not include property held for the personal use or consumption of the taxpayer or his family, or stock or shares in a corporation, or stock in trade of the taxpayer, or other property of a kind which would be properly included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of the taxable year.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this amendment affects what is known as the capital-gain provisions of the pending bill which are entirely new, not found in the existing law, and which provide that upon a gain derived through sale of capital assets only 40 per cent of such gain shall be treated as net income for the purpose of taxation under the bill. In other words, an income derived through capital gain will pay only 40 per cent of the taxes that an ordinary income would pay.

The reason for that, as is well known by the Senate, is that under existing law sales of property, real estate, mining property, and so forth, are prevented and sales are not made because of the requirement of existing law that the full gain shall be accounted for and taxed as income. I have been in sympathy with the committee in its view that some change should be made to facilitate the sale of property of that character, but it goes very much further than that.

Under the provisions of the bill as it stands to-day, corporations are taxed a maximum of 15 per cent upon their income. The excess-profits tax has been repealed. The bill has been very bitterly assailed on the other side of the aisle because of the discrimination in favor of corporations and against the individual taxpayer and partnership. I am very frank to say that the only answer which can be made to the charge is that while the taxes upon the corporations are very much less than the tax upon an individual engaged in the same business, nevertheless the only way a stockholder can get any benefit from the income of a corporation is through a dividend which must be made sooner or later, and that when made that dividend carries a surtax exactly as does the income of the individual, and the longer the dividend is deferred the higher the bracket it reaches. In other words, if three years' income is disposed of in one dividend, the taxpayer will have to pay a higher rate than if there had been an annual distribution. But, Mr. President, under the bill as it stands to-day this is what will happen: There will be no large corporations in the United States that will hereafter distribute cash dividends; they will all distribute stock dividends instead of cash, and under the bill as it stands when the stock dividend is sold, or when the original stock may be sold and the stock dividend takes its place, there will then be taxed as a gain—and that is the only way we can reach stock dividends under the decision of the Supreme Court—only 40 per cent of the amount realized. That is the situation as it stands to-day, unless this amendment or some other amendment accomplishing the same purpose shall be adopted. A corporation that distributes stock dividends can never be made to pay the true amount that it ought to pay by reason of that distribution; but a tax of not more than 40 per cent will be paid. No one can justify that, Mr. President. There is no reason why stock dividends when sold and a gain made should not be taxed to the individual as income, for that is really what they are.

As I said a moment ago, unless this amendment be adopted there will be very few cash dividends paid in the future. Stock dividends will be issued instead. Then, when the stock is sold, instead of accounting for the full amount, the seller will, under the bill as it stands, be compelled to account for only 40 per cent of that amount.

Then, in addition to that, Mr. President, I see no reason why a 100 per cent gain on the sale of stock should be excluded. I know of no reason why any man, speculating upon the stock exchange in New York the difference between his entire capital assets on the 1st day of the last January and his capital assets on the 1st day of next January, measuring his income by reason of those transactions, should be enabled to get away with the payment of only 40 per cent of the amount of taxes that a man engaged in business must pay. Yet that is what the bill in its present form does. I know of no way to avoid that, Mr. President, except through the amendment which I have proposed, and that is to take out of the 40 per cent provision entirely the sale of the stock of corporations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Wisconsin will recall that upon motion by myself earlier in the proceedings a limitation of two years was put upon the time when the capital assets could be sold.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We thought at that time that that would prevent just the thing the Senator has pointed out. Does the Senator feel that the two-year time limit would not reach the speculative stock gains?

Mr. LENROOT. I will tell the Senator just why that will not accomplish the purpose. Take a man who has held his stock, we will say, for two years and received stock dividends of 100 per cent. Instead of selling the stock dividends and getting the income, he can sell his original stock and substitute his stock-dividend stock for his original investment. Therefore, the amendment of which the Senator has procured the adoption will not impose more than a 40 per cent tax upon that man, notwithstanding the limitation that is imposed by the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think at the time the amendment was adopted we agreed that there was a possible weakness in it, and I am very glad the Senator from Wisconsin has offered this amendment, which I think strengthens and corrects the evil suggested.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. From what I could hear of the reading of the amendment, and from my conversation with the experts, I think the amendment is all right, but there is a possibility that there may develop some aspect in which it will need a little modification at the hands of the committee of conference.

Mr. LENROOT. I appreciate that; but I should like to get the matter in conference.

Mr. McCUMBER. So far as I am concerned, while I can not, of course, speak for the committee, I am in favor of accepting the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin and letting it go to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment ought to be accepted. It is an improvement of one of the many bad provisions of this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. All tax bills are bad; I appreciate that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield the floor if the committee is willing to accept the amendment. I do not care to occupy further time upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance during the discussion of this provision was aware that there was a chance of corporations declaring stock dividends, which, if held longer than two years, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has pointed out, could evade a part of the tax. I have tried to figure out whether this amendment will cover just what I know the Senator from Wisconsin has in mind and what I think is the proper thing to cover. In my opinion, the language used will hardly cover it; but I am perfectly willing, as the Senator suggests, that the matter should go to conference. Then we may frame the proper wording to cover the conditions, for the Senator from Wisconsin has stated the facts exactly as they exist, and has shown exactly what will happen; there is no doubt of that at all. Therefore, I hope the Senate will accept the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from Wisconsin was by him shown to me a little while ago, and I thought I would have an opportunity to look into it before it was called up, but I have been busy about other matters before the Senate and I did not do so. I think that probably the amendment is entirely proper. As I understand the Senator from North Dakota the matter will be looked into in conference, and I take it that if we adopt it it will be with the understanding the conferees may and will revise it so far as it requires revision in order to meet the end desired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not rise to offer an amendment, but to reserve a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment to section 1000. I do not recall the number of the paragraph, but the part on which I desire a separate vote is that which increases the capital-stock tax from $1 to $2 per $1,000. I desire simply to make the reservation broad enough so as to permit of a separate vote on that provision. It seems to me that it can be demonstrated that under it an injustice may be done to the stockholders of corporations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and I desire to say that it is the same amendment which was offered by me one evening last week. It provides that partnerships may within four months reorganize as corporations and gain the benefit of a corporation tax from January 1, 1921. There was a similar retroactive provision, but for a much longer time, in the act of 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 78, after line 20, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 229. That in the case of the organization as a corporation within four months from the passage of this act of any trade or business in which capital is a material income-producing factor, and which was previously owned by a parnership or individual, the net income of such trade or business from January 1, 1921, to the date of such organization may at the option of the individual or partnership be taxed as the net income of a corporation is taxed under Titles II and III; in which event the net income and invested capital of such trade or business shall be computed as if such corporation had been in existence on and after January 1, 1921, and the undistributed profits or earnings of such trade or business shall not be subject to the surtaxes imposed in section 211, but amounts distributed on and after January 1, 1921, from the earnings or profits of such trade or business accumulated after December 31, 1920, shall be taxed to the recipients as dividends; and all the provisions of Titles II and III relating to corporations shall so far as practicable apply to such trade or business: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any trade or business the net income of which for the taxable year 1921 was less than 20 per cent of its invested capital for such year: Provided further, That any taxpayer who takes advantage of this paragraph shall pay the tax imposed by section 1000 of the revenue act of 1918 as if such taxpayer had been a corporation on and after January 1, 1921.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to know why the Senator restricts his amendment to partnerships that did not make 20 per cent or more during the year 1921?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that provision is incorporated in the amendment, so that no excuse will be afforded a corporation to avoid paying the excess-profits tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am in favor of the main purpose which is sought to be accomplished by the amendment, namely, that those engaged in business as partners may be treated the same as corporations are treated in regard to taxation under the provision for a 15 per cent tax; but I do not see why we should deny that privilege to a partnership that did not make at least 20 per cent in the year 1921. Why is it desired to preclude partnerships which carry on trade or business and have been earning only reasonable profits and to give the privilege conferred by the amendment upon those which have been making 20 per cent or more, probably many of which have been profiteering and charging exorbitant profits or making unreasonable profits? That is a feature of the amendment which, it seems to me, is objectionable.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If the Senator will yield, I will say that that provision was put in as a protective feature, because it is in the existing law. If the Senator objects to it I should be very glad to take that part of it out. I send the 1919 act to the desk and ask that section 330 be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what part it is proposed to take out. I am familiar with his amendment as he offered it a few days ago.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is that part which provides that the concerns must have earned 20 per cent on their capital.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that is a very objectionable feature of the amendment myself. Of course, that is only my opinion in regard to it, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Senator from New Jersey ask that an extract be read from the desk?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; I ask that section 330 of the present revenue law be read from the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

SEC. 330. That in the case of the reorganization, consolidation, or change of ownership after January 1, 1911, of a trade or business now carried on by a corporation, the corporation shall for the purposes of this title be deemed to have been in existence prior to that date, and the net income and invested capital of such predecessor trade or business for all or any part of the prewar period prior to the organization of the corporation now carrying on such trade or business shall be deemed to have been the net income and invested capital of such corporation.

If such predecessor trade or business was carried on by a partnership or individual the net income for the prewar period shall, under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, be ascertained and returned as nearly as may be upon the same basis and in the same manner as provided for corporations in Title II, including a reasonable deduction for salary or compensation to each partner or the individual for personal services actually rendered.

In the case of the organization as a corporation before July 1, 1919, of any trade or business in which capital is a material income-producing factor and which was previously owned by a partnership or individual, the net income of such trade or business from January 1, 1918, to the date of such reorganization may at the option of the individual or partnership be taxed as the net income of a corporation is taxed under Titles II and III; in which event the net income and invested capital of such trade or business shall be computed as if such corporation had been in existence on and after January 1, 1918, and the undistributed profits or earnings of such trade or business shall not be subject to the surtax imposed in section 211, but amounts distributed on or after January 1, 1918, from the earnings of such trade or business shall be taxed to the recipients as dividends, and all the provisions of Titles II and III relating to corporations shall so far as practicable apply to such trade or business: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any trade or business the net income of which for the taxable year 1918 was less than 20 per cent of its invested capital for such year: Provided further, That any taxpayer who takes advantage of this paragraph shall pay the tax imposed by section 1000 of this act and by the first subdivision of section 407 of the revenue act of 1916, as if such taxpayer had been a corporation on and after January 1, 1918, with a capital stock having no par value.

If any asset of the trade or business in existence both during the taxable year and any prewar year is included in the invested capital for the taxable year, but is not included in the invested capital for such prewar year, or is valued on a different basis in computing the invested capital for the taxable year and such prewar year, respectively, then under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary such readjustments shall be made as are necessary to place the computation of the invested capital for such prewar year on the basis employed in determining the invested capital for the taxable year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have not given very careful consideration to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, and I should like to have some further explanation regarding it. If it is what I think it is, it seems to me to be only a step in the direction in which I think we should go, a step in the direction of equality of taxation. If there is an advantage in being a corporation over being a partnership, it has been my disposition all along to let the parties take advantage of whatever situation would be of most benefit to them.

I may state at this time that I have an amendment pending here which is intended to carry out that general idea. I do not suppose any partnership would want to incorporate unless there were advantages to be gained by that incorporation. It rather indicates and furnishes very concrete evidence of the fact that there is this great disparity in our taxation laws as between the partnership and the corporation, so I have an amendment, which is upon the table and which I expect to present a little later, giving these parties the right to make returns as it may be to their advantage. I think that unless such an amendment as mine be adopted, we ought to do what the Senator from New Jersey proposes; but his amendment presupposes that there will be a vast benefit by a partnership acting as a corporation, and therefore that the advantage will be so great as to warrant the partnership in organizing as a corporation, and he wants to make it retroactive and include the business of 1921.

I do not believe that we ought to have our revenue law so framed as to furnish an inducement for concerns doing business to reorganize and do business in another form. If people want to do business as a partnership, the taxation laws should be such as not to force them to change their form of doing business. They should be permitted to make a return as a corporation without actually organizing a corporation and losing all the benefit which they thought they were obtaining from doing business as a partnership. If the amendment which I intend to propose shall be adopted, it will make this sort of thing wholly unnecessary.

Unquestionably, the Senator from New Jersey has in mind some partnerships that would be taxed at a much higher rate as partnerships than they would be if permitted to organize as a corporation; and I believe that that will become very much more accentuated after the passage of this bill. The discrimination under this bill as between individuals and partnerships on the one hand and corporations on the other is the most glaring thing which has ever been proposed in revenue legislation, I believe; and if this bill is passed as it comes from the committee, and as it seems it will pass, practically all of the copartnerships and individuals doing business in this country will have to organize as corporations. I think that is an outrageous situation. I do not believe that we should force these people to change the form in which they transact business; but if this bill goes through as it is now the business concerns of this country will do just what the Senator from New Jersey is proposing that they may do. Those who are doing business as partnerships will reorganize and do business as corporations. They will be forced to do it. I see no reason why they should not be permitted to do it, but I do not think we ought to force them to do it; and while I do not believe that there would be any serious objection to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, I do think that there is objection to the provisions of this bill which make it necessary to propose such an amendment as that.

Taxation should be equal, to begin with. It should bear equally upon partnerships and corporations, and there should be no inducement to change from one way of doing business to another. If, however, you are going to do this thing, if you are going to show favoritism and give an inducement for people to do business as a corporation, then I think the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is nothing but fair. It enables these concerns to reorganize, to form corporations, and get the benefit of the lower tax which the Congress proposes to impose upon corporations. I say that the doing of this thing, which gives an inducement for such reorganizations, is unwarranted and ought not to be in any revenue law; but evidently we are going to have it. We are going to have it, so that a great many concerns in this country doing business as partnerships will have to reorganize and become corporations. I do not think it should be done, and I do not believe we ought to force those people to transform their business and change their whole way of doing business simply because of the discrimination in the revenue laws of the Federal Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when this matter was before the Senate heretofore I made some observations with respect to it. I wish now to add to those remarks only some few further thoughts, resulting from further reflection.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] is undoubtedly right. After the year 1921, when the excess-profits tax will no longer be in force, the discrimination against partnerships and in favor of corporations will be almost unspeakable; and it amazes me that the committee is willing to let this bill go through without any more serious effort than has been made to correct this great inequality which will exist after it goes into full effect on the 1st day of January, 1922.

For the year 1921 the excess-profits tax is in force; and, as was pointed out by the Senator from Wisconsin the other day, if a partnership should be permitted retroactively to incorporate, as proposed in this amendment, of course that partnership converted into a corporation would have to pay the excess-profits tax in addition to the tax which it would have to pay as a partnership. That, of course, makes the inequality during this year much less than it would be next year; but, Mr. President, the inequality will still exist. We tried to remedy that inequality in the old law by exempting partnerships from the excess-profits tax, and I think we accomplished that, because the excess-profits taxes at that time were very high; but the excess-profits tax now for the year 1922 will be a negligible factor in bringing about equality as compared to the period from 1918 to 1920. It will not bring equality.

Mr. President, with a proviso in this bill not permitting a partnership retroactively to incorporate unless its earnings from its business were as much as 20 per cent upon its invested capital, assuring that such concerns as take advantage of this provision will have to pay an excess-profits tax upon at least 12 per cent of their earnings upon their invested capital, I think no injustice and no wrong would come from permitting partnerships to take advantage of this privilege for the purpose of bringing about something like parity with corporations in the payment of taxes.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] is absolutely right. After this bill gets into full operation the inequalities will be so great, the discrimination in favor of the corporation as against the partnership and the individual will be so striking, that there will be a rush in this country on the part of partnerships, and on the part of individuals who can do it, to convert their businesses into corporations. It will be their only refuge.

In competition, equality of taxation is just as important as equality in the cost of production, and if the individual business man of this country is to be taxed 38 per cent upon his profits, in competition with the corporation taxed upon the same amount of earnings practically 17 per cent, of course the individual will be greatly handicapped.

If a partnership with a tax of 35 per cent upon its earnings of a million dollars, I will say—for that is the figure used in the table which I presented here—has to do business in competition with a corporation, while a corporation doing business with an income of a million dollars will pay less than 20 per cent, of course that will be a handicap to the partnership, and we may expect not only the individual but the partnership to try to rid itself of that inequality in competition, and after this year I believe that most of the businesses of this country which can do so will assume the corporate form.

I do not believe that would be a healthy thing to happen, I do not wish to see it happen, and I hope something will be done to more equally tax these different groups of taxpayers.

In the meantime, Mr. President, I do not think the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey, with the proviso to which I have referred, is a proposition which we can justly turn down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in connection with this subject I desire now to have the amendment which I have proposed presented to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The reading clerk read as follows:

(e) An individual or partnership engaged in any trade or business may at any time after January 1, 1922, file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a statement declaring an election to be, for all the purposes of this title, an association with respect to such trade or business, and thereafter, for the taxable year in which such election is made and for succeeding taxable years, such association shall be taxable with respect to such trade or business as a corporation under Part III of this title, and also subject to all other provisions of this title relative to corporations. Any distribution of profits made by such association to the individual or individuals comprising it shall constitute dividends under this title, and shall be included in gross income of the distributee as of the date when the cash or other property is unqualifiedly separated from the other property of such association as the property or to the credit of the distributee outside of such trade or business.

(f) An election once made under subdivision (c) of this section shall not be subject to change by such association or by the individual or individuals comprising it, and shall be binding upon such individual or individuals and upon their personal representatives with respect to such trade or business, and upon any other individual or individuals entering into any new partnership with such electing individual or individuals or with their personal representatives with respect to such trade or business, unless and until the commissioner advises such association in writing that owing to changes in the ownership or nature of such trade or business, or in the provisions of this title affecting the same, it is necessary or just that it be relieved from such election.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico obtained the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he will not permit me to make a brief statement.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will be glad to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, during my absence from the Chamber the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. PENROSE] made some strictures upon the minority, charging that we have deliberately, and with malice aforethought, prevented him from getting up the so-called refunding bill. I want to give the Senate the history of that bill.

It was introduced in the Senate on June 21 and referred to the Committee on Finance. On June 29 we began hearings. We had hearings for one day, on June 29. Then we adjourned those hearings until July 14. On July 14 we had hearings for another day, and then we adjourned them again, and on August 19, by direction of the committee, the chairman reported that bill to the Senate.

The bill which the chairman of the committee, in the recklessness of his statement, said he had been unable to secure consideration of by the Senate because of the obstructive tactics of the minority, was presented on August 19, and I state to the Senate that from that day to this, three long months, not a single, solitary effort has been made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance to secure the consideration of the bill by the Senate. He has not asked that it be taken up; he has not done one thing to bring about its consideration, and when under those circumstances he comes into the Senate and makes this serious charge and reflection upon the minority, there is no way to account for it except by attributing it, as I do, to a reckless disregard of the facts, as in the case of many other statements he has made upon the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to submit a few remarks in connection with the strictures of the Senator from Pennsylvania upon what he charges as factional and obstructive tactics upon this side of the Chamber touching the bill under consideration.

My experience here for eight years, during six of which the control was on this side of the Chamber, leads me to regard with some patience these animadversions from the other side of the Chamber concerning obstructive tactics.

The session of the Congress ending on the 4th of March, 1915, concluded with an obvious filibuster on the other side of the Chamber against what was known as the shipping bill.

The session concluding on the 4th of March, 1917, ended with another filibuster, operated from the other side of the Chamber, against what was known as the armed ships bill.

The session of 1919 terminated with another filibuster from the other side of the Chamber.

Long speeches have been made on this side in connection with the discussion of this measure, many of them, in my own judgment, too protracted. But that is a fault that is not confined exclusively to the speakers upon this side of the Chamber. Of course, with respect to most measures, the greater part of the time is consumed by those who are opposing the measure rather than by those who are advocating it, so it is not at all strange that more time should have been consumed upon the Democratic side in discussing this measure than upon the Republican side.

But, Mr. President, let us institute a few comparisons for the purpose of illustration. Apparently there has not been any undue time spent in the consideration of the bill now before the Senate. Indeed, compared with other important revenue measures, it has progressed with unusual celerity. It was reported to the Senate on the 22d day of August, 1921, and finally reported from the Committee on Finance on the 26th day of September, 1921.

The McKinley bill, the important revenue measure of its time, was reported to the Senate on the 17th day of June, 1890, and passed on the 10th day of September, 1890, a period practically of three months.

The Wilson tariff measure was reported to the Senate on March 20, 1894, and passed by the Senate on July 3, 1894, about three months later.

The Dingley tariff measure was reported to the Senate on May 4, 1897, and passed July 7, 1897, rather unusually rapid work.

The Spanish-American revenue measure, of course, was passed quickly, being a war measure. It was reported on the 12th day of May, 1898, and passed the Senate June 4, 1898.

The Payne-Aldrich measure was reported to the Senate on April 12, 1909, and passed the Senate July 8, 1909, practically three months from the date it came to the Senate.

The Underwood tariff measure, reported by a Democratic Congress, the opposition to which came from the Republican side, as a matter of course, came to the Senate on July 11, 1913, and passed on September 9, 1913, a period of about two months.

The revenue measure of 1916, known as the Kitchin revenue measure, was reported to the Senate on August 16, 1916, and passed September 5, 1916, rather rapid work.

The revenue measure of 1917, a war measure, presented in the midst of the war, was reported to the Senate July 3, 1917, and was not passed by the Senate until September 9, 1917, a period of over two months.

In other words, Mr. President, it took practically as long to pass the Kitchin bill, a war revenue measure, in the midst of the war, as has been consumed in the consideration of the pending measure.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I remind the Senator that during a part of the time when this bill has been pending we were handling two other measures, the tolls repeal bill and the German treaty?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is true. Those two measures were before the Senate during the time this measure has been before the Senate.

The Kitchin revenue measure of 1918 was reported to the Senate December 6, 1918, and passed by the Senate quite rapidly, on December 23, 1918.

So, Mr. President, when the Senator from Pennsylvania charges Senators upon this side with effrontery—a plain violation of the rules of the Senate, I take it, not to speak of the courtesy that is due from one gentleman to another—it must be regarded as the mere vaporings of a political speech.

Moreover, Mr. President, those of us who had an opportunity to observe the Senator from Pennsylvania harbor no feeling of resentment at these outpourings on his part. We appreciate they are not spoken with sincerity. We understand perfectly well that they are put in the RECORD merely that the country may be in some manner or other impressed by them.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have made some considerable argument heretofore on the great disparities apparent in the bill. I do not care to discuss the matter at any considerable length, not even for the 10 minutes allotted to me, because Members of the Senate realize that there is very great discrimination, which in hundreds and thousands of cases will result in extreme hardship unless there is either a reorganization of the business or the owners of the business can make their returns in the form in which they could make them if they were to reorganize.

I do not believe that the people of the country desire to force the business of the individual and partnership into corporate form. I think it is unwise to force that sort of a situation. Senators talk about watered stock and about monopoly and all that sort of thing, as well as unlimited individual liability, things which have become perfectly abhorrent to many of the people of the country. Why force the business interests who are now doing business as partnerships and individuals to organize into corporations when by the provisions of the amendment which I submit they can go on doing business and pay their taxation at the same rate as a corporation, without having to change their form of doing business?

If the amendment is agreed to, I shall then propose another amendment permitting corporations to make their returns as partnerships if they wish. We have now a provision of law permitting personal service corporations to make returns as partnerships. It is true that we are going to repeal it as to the years following the present year, but I do not see why we should. Why not make that reciprocal? The Congress has recognized that some kinds of corporations should be permitted to make returns as partnerships, and we have permitted them to do it. It has been in the law and it is in the law now, and if we are going to recognize the justice of allowing some corporations to make returns as partnerships why should we not permit partnerships to make returns as corporations?

I sincerely trust that the acting chairman of the committee will not oppose the amendment. It goes right to the point of equality in taxation, and the people of the country, in my judgment, want that thing above everything else. They are willing to bear their burdens if they know that everybody else with the same degree of prosperity is bearing the same burden, but I submit that nobody can furnish an excuse or reason for an absolute disparity and an absolute favoritism for those people who happen to be doing business in corporate form.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senate by the viva voce vote has just adopted the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], an amendment that differs only a little from the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico. Both of them provide that a partnership may pay its taxes as a corporation. I think the amendment went through with little consideration. I opposed it the other day and gave my reasons for my opposition. I have not changed my mind about those reasons. Certainly we ought not to put upon the bill two propositions worded in different ways covering the same subject matter. We would scarcely know which one we are supposed to stand by.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think there is a vast difference. There is no similarity in fact between the two amendments. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey simply provided certain advantages which partnerships might get if they did organize as corporations. My amendment proposes to make it unnecessary for them to organize as corporations. The Senator's amendment gives advantages to partnerships which may organize as corporations. My amendment gives the advantages without forcing a change in organization.

Mr. McCUMBER. The two certainly ought not to be in the same bill, in my opinion. I have no doubt that if we now take the Frelinghuysen amendment which was offered, it may open up the whole subject for conference, and any other amendment might be made to that to make it conform to the provisions desired by the Senator from New Mexico if necessary, but it does seem to me improper to place the two of them together on the same bill.

I stated, and I reiterate the statement, that I doubt if it is a proper thing in this bill to provide that a partnership may do business as a partnership until the 1st day of January, 1922, and if the partners decide that if their business had been incorporated the individual partners would not pay as much upon dividends as they are compelled to pay as the partners in the partnership, that they may therefore cease to be a partnership and may incorporate, and have four months after the 1st day of January, 1922, to make their returns.

If, as I said, they do make up their minds in favor of that change for the purpose of saving the taxes, they can do so under the proposed amendment. If that is the right kind of law, to say to individuals that they can wait until the end of the year, wait until the law is passed, and then determine which way it would be best to avoid the tax—if we allow that and then go no further and say to the corporation it shall not have that right to dissolve and to pay taxes as a partnership, it seems to me we are playing fast and loose with the revenue law. For that reason it seems to me decidedly improper to allow either a partnership or a corporation to determine at the end of the year whether it shall adopt one measure or the other; and, of course, the force which will produce the decision will be whether it will be advantageous or disadvantageous.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment which I proposed does not apply annually. After the election is once made the election continues. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to another fact, that the effect of the Frelinghuysen amendment which we have just agreed to is only temporary. It only provides for one year, and certainly intends to be retroactive to the first of this year. There is no inconsistency between the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey and the one which I have offered.

I sincerely trust that the Senator from North Dakota will not oppose my amendment on the ground that there is any conflict between the two or that there is any overlapping of the two, because there is neither. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey simply provides what shall be done if the corporations are formed before the next return day. Mine provides what shall be done in the event there is no reorganization at all. They are not inconsistent, and they do not overlap. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is only to meet the particular case where they do want to incorporate. I earnestly hope the Senator will not confuse the two and try to give the impression that there is any overlapping of the two amendments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, they are both retroactive. They both refer to the taxes that shall be paid on business that was done previous to the change of organization, and that is my principal objection to them. It does seem to me that all laws of this character ought to be prospective and not retroactive. I have read both of the amendments and I think there is an inconsistency between them. I am willing to have the matter voted upon, and if it shall be put in we will go to conference on it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New Mexico if his amendment would not give advantages to individuals and partnerships that corporations do not enjoy? Under the Senator's amendment there will be allowed the advantages of part 3 as to a corporation, and while having those advantages they will not be called upon to pay a capital-stock tax as other corporations must pay. It gives them a distinct advantage over corporations. Does the Senator contend that that is fair?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am quite willing to say that the question of the capital-stock tax was not considered. I do not believe that my amendment would make the business pay any capital-stock tax, and I do not think that it should, because unless we have a corporate organization I do not see why they should pay a capital-stock tax. The amendment does provide, however, that—they shall be taxable with respect to such trade or business as a corporation under part 3 of this title and also subject to all other provisions of this title relative to corporations.

Mr. LENROOT. But that has nothing to do with the capital-stock tax, for that is not a part of this title.

Again, the amendment proposes that an individual may be permitted to treat himself as a corporation for the purpose of taxation, and the amendment further provides that any distribution of profits shall be regarded as dividends for taxation. Here is a man in business who has $100,000 invested. He makes $50,000 profit, and after he has elected to consider himself a corporation for the purpose of taxation he says, "I am going to reduce my capital investment and I will withdraw $50,000 of my original capital." What does the Senator think would be the result of such a transaction on his part under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I beg the Senator's pardon. My attention was diverted and I did not hear his question.

Mr. LENROOT. I will restate it. An individual is engaged in business with a capital investment of $100,000. He has profits during the year of $50,000. The Senator's amendment provides that any distribution of profits shall be taxed as dividends; but suppose the individual should say, "I am going to withdraw $50,000 of my original investment of capital," and he does. What would be the result?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Precisely the same result as if that business were organized as a corporation. If he withdraws dividends, then he pays personal taxes upon those dividends in connection with his other income.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator must have misunderstood me. I asked if he withdrew one-half of his capital from the business, what would be the result?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If he withdrew one-half of his capital from the business, it would have precisely the same result that would follow if the corporation distributed its capital stock or its invested capital. It would operate precisely the same as in the case of a corporation.

Mr. LENROOT. It would not be taxable.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is not taxable now.

Mr. LENROOT. But now the individual is taxable upon the $50,000 profit, irrespective of his investment. The trouble with the proposition is that a man may, without any form of incorporation, perpetrate the fiction of treating himself as a corporation for one purpose and an individual for another.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Wisconsin must realize that thus far all individuals and partnerships who have been doing business have paid their surtaxes of every kind and description upon all the earnings which they have been making ever since we have had an income tax law.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator surely does not want to take my time to tell me that; I am aware of that; I appreciate the situation that the Senator desires to remedy, but in attempting to remedy that situation we ought not to get into an impossible one. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator realizes that a corporation when it distributes its capital does not have to pay any further tax upon it, and it would be just the same with an individual; but I desire again to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that he is wrong in concluding that this amendment of mine is retroactive. If the Senator will read the provision of the amendment, on lines 5 and 6, he will see that it is not retroactive. The amendment reads in this way:

(e) An individual or partnership engaged in any trade or business may at any time after January 1, 1922, file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a statement declaring an election to be, for all the purposes of this title, an association with respect to such trade or business, and thereafter, for the taxable year in which such election is made and for succeeding taxable years.

So the amendment is not retroactive. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is temporary and retroactive, but my amendment is not. The amendment only goes into operation after the election has been made and only for the taxable year in which the election is made. It does not go into effect until after the 1st of next January. So I hope the Senator will recognize the situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that I recognize the situation. I think, however, that both the Senator and myself are not acting in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, because the Senator spoke once on his amendment and I spoke once on it, and I do not think, under the unanimous-consent agreement, either of us has a right to make another speech on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from North Dakota was speaking in the time of the Senator from New Mexico and that the Senator from New Mexico spoke in answer to an inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Wisconsin has spoken in between, but I do not know in whose time. Now, I will simply say, in a minute, in reply, suppose the organization is effected in December of 1921, it will cover all of the taxable year of 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. GERRY. I wish to add to the announcement just made by the Senator from Kansas that if the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "yea."

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, notwithstanding the vote just taken, I am going to propose another amendment. On page 64, line 24, I move to strike out the word "such" and insert the word "any." We have in this bill a most peculiar provision. Section 220 of the bill provides:

SEC. 220. That if any corporation, however created or organized, is formed or availed of for the purpose of preventing the imposition of the surtax upon its stockholders or members through the medium of permitting its gains and profits to accumulate instead of being divided or distributed, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of such corporation a tax equal to 25 per cent of the amount thereof, which shall be in addition to the tax imposed by section 230 of this title and shall be computed, collected, and paid at the same time and in the same manner and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as that tax: Provided—

And I ask the attention of Senators to the proviso—

That if all the stockholders or members of such corporation agree thereto, the commissioner may, in lieu of all income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed upon the corporation for the taxable year, tax the stockholders or members of such corporation upon their distributive shares.

There we have a provision that if there is a corporation organized for the purpose of defeating the high surtaxes, and the parties are found out, they may then make a return as a partnership, if the stockholders want to do it. If you are going to extend that privilege to a corporation which was organized for the purpose of violating our revenue laws, why should you not extend it to all corporations?

I therefore move to strike out the word "such" and insert the word "any."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 64, line 24, before the word "corporation," it is proposed to strike out the word "such" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "any."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], who is absent. Being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MCKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I am not able to obtain a transfer, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. ERNST. I transfer my pair with my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MOSES (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; and

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of paying the ex-service men who are entitled to the same the $60 additional compensation authorized under the provisions of section 1406 of an act to provide revenue, and for other purposes, approved February 24, 1919. Payments made from this appropriation shall be made in conformity with the provisions of the said section 1406.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this amendment involves the question as to whether or not we will provide funds for the purpose of meeting promptly the payment of the $60 additional pay that was provided for in the amendment which was adopted to the revenue act of 1919. As Senators will recall, we provided as an amendment to the revenue act of 1919 for an allowance of $60 to each ex-service man. Recently it has been brought to my attention by a soldier whom I have been trying to assist—and I have heard of some other cases—that while his claim is in order and has been duly approved for the $60 it can not be paid, in view of the fact that there has been a lapse of the appropriation from which it should have been paid.

Under those circumstances, it seems to me that we should provide funds immediately, and not wait until we pass a deficiency appropriation bill at some later date. If we await the passage of a general deficiency bill upon this subject later on, we shall probably have a delay of several months, and a number of soldiers who are entitled to their pay will be deprived of drawing that $60 each until we pass an appropriation for the purpose of meeting the payment.

I have a letter on this subject from the Comptroller General which really explains the situation. It is a copy of a letter dated October 21, 1921, addressed to my colleague [Mr.

FLETCHER], who is also interested in behalf of trying to assist this young man.

The letter reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to advise you that this division issued certificate No. 42193 October 21, 1921, and forwarded the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, for the settlement of the claim of A. De Castro for discharge gratuity as former fireman, third class, United States Naval Reserve Force.

As the appropriation from which this claim is payable has lapsed, it will have to be reported to Congress for an appropriation, and as soon as such appropriation shall be made a warrant in the sum of $60 will be forwarded to Mr. De Castro at 803 Catherine Street, Key West, Fla., without any further action from him.

Sincerely, yours,

(Signed) J. R. MCCARL,
Comptroller General.

That really presents the case. I do not think we should delay the matter of making the appropriation to pay ex-service men who under the law are entitled to this additional compensation; and I offer the amendment with the hope that the funds may be provided for immediate settlement with those who have not been so fortunate as to receive their pay heretofore.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me why he places the sum at $50,000—what information he has that $50,000 is needed for the purpose, or that many times $50,000 is not needed?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I placed it at that sum because I thought that would take care of all the cases that were approved up to the time Congress acted upon the general deficiency appropriation bill and made provision for them. That was my object in doing it. I placed it at that sum because I thought it would give an immediate settlement to those who have had claims already approved or who may present them before action may be taken hereafter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, so far we have maintained our purpose to have this a revenue-producing bill and not an appropriation bill. I hope we shall maintain that to the end. I can see nothing to be gained by converting it into an appropriation bill or into a general legislation bill. If there are soldiers who have not been paid by reason of the lapse of the previous appropriation, the provision of which the Senator speaks should be put in the urgent deficiency bill. That bill is being ground out in the House at the present time. In all probability it will reach the Senate and be disposed of a considerable time before this tax bill will be disposed of by the conferees. Nothing would be gained by it, and it certainly is most improper to attach it as an appropriation to a revenue-producing bill.

For that reason, I hope that the Senator upon second thought—as did the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] the other day, in withdrawing an amendment for hospitals for the soldiers—will conclude that there is a proper place for those bills, and that he will gain time, so far as securing the remedy is concerned, by placing his bill before the proper committee, having a quick investigation, which they can get from the War Department, ascertaining just what will be necessary and putting it into the appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator for his care in looking out for the soldiers, and I trust that there are not many of them who have not received $60 bonus we have provided heretofore.

What the Senator from North Dakota has said is entirely true, and, indeed, he might have gone further, because the War Department has already sent to the House an estimate of something like $2,000,000 for various items where the appropriation lapsed because of the ending of the fiscal year on July 1, or where something of importance has occurred making an immediate appropriation necessary.

When the House has framed the bill covering that estimate it will come over to the Senate immediately, and the intention is to pass it through the Senate quickly, without much debate. The bill can be brought up promptly, because, as the Senator knows, appropriation bills have preference over other measures.

In all probability there will also be an urgent deficiency bill soon after the commencement of the next term, but the present year's deficiencies will undoubtedly be taken care of in this bill now being made up, which, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, will pass, no doubt, long before the tax bill will become a law.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if that is the case, this amendment on this bill will not do any harm. My amendment provides for the appropriation of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and if the object I have in mind is taken care of through some other measure more quickly than we can get the relief by this amendment, then no harm would be done.

It is quite a different situation from the one presented by the Senator from Arizona a few days ago. This is to provide an appropriation to meet an already authorized benefit in the way of an additional compensation allowance to soldiers. Some of them have been so unfortunate that they have not yet received the money to which they are entitled. I do not think we should delay for one moment. It is an obligation which should be paid, and paid promptly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. The language of the agreement is:

Thenceforward no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida having spoken once on his amendment, he is not now in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move to amend the amendment I have sent to the desk by inserting the figures "$100,000" in place of "$50,000." I propose that as an amendment to my own amendment, and now I shall speak to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I raise the point that that is the same amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not amend his own amendment; he can modify it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know but what I can amend my own amendment, or propose a suggestion to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can modify it.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, if a verbal modification of an amendment could be made so as to give a Senator another 10 minutes, the agreement would be valueless.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does not give the Senator another 10 minutes. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR (when Mr. CARAWAY's name was called). I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Arkansas on account of illness, and I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. In his absence, being unable to obtain a transfer, I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I transfer it to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I am at liberty to vote on this amendment, and therefore vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MOSES. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and in his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. ERNST. Making the same transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 39, as follows:

So Mr. TRAMMELL'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The reading clerk read as follows:

SEC. 413. That on and after January 1, 1922, a tax equal to the sum of the following is hereby imposed upon the transfer of property by gift by every person, whether a resident or nonresident of the United States:

One per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $20,000 but do not exceed $50,000;

Two per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $50,000 and do not exceed $150,000;

Three per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $150,000 and do not exceed $250,000;

Four per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $250,000 and do not exceed $450,000;

Six per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $450,000 and do not exceed $750,000;

Eight per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $750,000 and do not exceed $1,000,000;

Ten per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $1,000,000 and do not exceed $1,500,000;

Twelve per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $1,500,000 and do not exceed $2,000,000;

Fourteen per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $2,000,000 and do not exceed $3,000,000;

Sixteen per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $3,000,000 and do not exceed $4,000,000;

Eighteen per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $4,000,000 and do not exceed $5,000,000;

Twenty per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $5,000,000 and do not exceed $8,000,000;

Twenty-two per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $8,000,000 and do not exceed $10,000,000;

Twenty-five per cent of the amount by which the gifts exceed $10,000,000.

SEC. 414. The amount of the gifts subject to the tax imposed by section 413, in the case of residents, shall be the sum of all the gifts made by the taxpayer during the calendar year. If the gift is made in property, the fair market value of the property at the date of the gift shall be considered the amount of the gift subject to tax.

SEC. 415. The amount of the gifts subject to the tax imposed by section 413, in the case of a nonresident, shall be the sum of all gifts made by the taxpayer during the calendar year of property situated within the United States.

SEC. 416. The tax imposed by section 413 shall not apply to (1) contributions or gifts made with the calendar year to or for the use of (a) the United States, any State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia for exclusively public purposes; (b) any corporation or community chest, fund, or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, no part of the net earning of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual; or (c) the special fund for vocational rehabilitation authorized by section 7 of the vocational rehabilitation act, nor (2) to gifts which are taxable under the provisions of section 402 (c).

SEC. 417. The tax imposed by section 413 shall be paid by the donor on or before the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of the calendar year, and shall be computed, collected, and paid on the same basis, in the same manner, and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as the tax imposed by section 401.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this amendment relates to a subject which was often considered by the members of the Finance Committee, and discussed in and out of this Chamber at great length. It is an amendment which proposes to tax gifts. It seeks to place an excise tax upon gifts of money or property made by donors to relatives and friends for the purpose of having their tax burdens lessened by lowering their incomes so as to fall within an income bracket that would lessen materially their tax.

I need not at this late hour, in view of the earlier discussion of this matter, dwell at length upon the extent to which gifts have been made for the purpose of evading taxation. I want to quote a sentence or two from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, on this subject:

> Taxpayers on large incomes and businesses are finding a hundred different methods of legally reducing their obligations to the Government. One of the most common methods found in vogue by Treasury experts was for men of large incomes to create trusts for members of their families, thus reducing their own net income and consequent liability for taxes.

Were it not for the fact that they have so very many difficult and intricate problems confronting them, I believe the committee would have found a way to put a tax upon gifts.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I would like to have some information from the Senator as to the rates.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The rate fixed in the amendment is 1 per cent upon gifts between $20,000 and $50,000. There is no tax whatever on gifts less than $20,000. The rate above $50,000 is graduated up to 25 per cent on $10,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I want to get at is this: Is the tax imposed upon any gift, whether it is the passing of property through a legacy or a gift which might be made, for instance, by the Senator to one of his children? Would such a gift be taxed?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I just wanted to get that clear in my mind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Any gift of over $20,000 made to any person would be taxed. I might say that I do not think there will be any serious question about the rate, for the figures are very moderate, having purposely made the rate very small in order to try out the experiment of taxing gifts.

In nearly every State in the Union gifts or legacies made at death are taxable, and this amendment simply seeks to tax inter vivos gifts—those made during the donor's lifetime.

The making of gifts is perfectly legal. It does not often happen that gifts are made voluntarily of large sums of money. There is something in human nature, even in the nature of a parent, a father or a mother, that leads them to cling to their possessions and their wealth and not distribute their money until death comes. It is very rarely that substantial gifts are made, even to one's own relatives, during one's lifetime, except for the purpose of evading taxes or lowering the tax rate which would be imposed in case no gifts were made and the estate was kept intact.

Hundreds of millions of dollars have been lost to the Government through the making of gifts and the creating of trusts. No effort has been made whatever to stop this evasion, and this is the last chance to limit that abuse that everybody has denounced and that has become notorious.

Let me give some figures in a concrete case to show what can be done in the way of evading taxes in this way. Let me tell you what a Senator on this floor told me. He informed me that he had at one time an opportunity to make $60,000 by making gifts—that is, to save $60,000 in his tax bill by making gifts to his children.

Let us take the case of the taxes upon an individual's income upon $100,000. Under the provisions of the bill as reported by the committee the normal and surtax upon that sum of money would be $20,780. If that man made an irrevocable trust of one-half of that sum or made a gift of $50,000, the individual would pay $5,500 on his net income and $5,500 would be paid by the trustee of the trust fund, making the total $11,000, a saving of $9,780 in taxes by splitting his estate in two and making an irrevocable trust or gift.

I am not going to discuss the question longer. The illustrations I have given could be multiplied very many times. Do we want to stop the making of gifts for the purpose of escaping taxation? The Secretary of the Treasury has pointed out to us the extent of this abuse. Some one has estimated that we are losing about $600,000,000 yearly in this way. Are we powerless to stop it when we know that it is absolutely done for the evasion of taxes by the ultra rich? Who can complain against a tax of 1 per cent upon a gift of $50,000? On a gift of $50,000 a tax of $500 would be a trifle for the right to make a gift to a relative or friend which would cause a substantial loss in the Government's income revenues.

I think there is a good deal of sympathy in favor of this proposition on the other side of the aisle. I should like to have the acting chairman of the committee accept the amendment if he will do so. I believe that many Republicans feel a good deal as I do about it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield; but I hope the Senator will bear in mind that I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In the event that a small consideration is provided as a sort of shield to take the gift out of the amendment as proposed by the Senator, would not the amendment as proposed be very easily evaded?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it is possible that it could be evaded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like for that reason to propose to the Senator an amendment. I have an amendment of the same character which imposes a very much higher rate than the rate contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have tried to make the rate very moderate, having in mind that it is an innovation and having in mind also that it would be difficult to get anything agreed to here that was not moderate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would suggest to the Senator that at the end of section 414 of his amendment there be added the following:

Where property is sold or exchanged for a consideration less than 50 per cent of, or materially disproportionate to, the fair market value of the property so sold or exchanged, then the amount by which such fair market value exceeds the consideration received shall be included in computing the amount of gifts made during the calendar year.

I think that would meet the objection suggested. I suggest it to the Senator, if he will be willing to accept it as an amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. For the purpose of strengthening and sustaining the provisions of my amendment I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

I wish to close with one further word. Let us not pass this revenue bill without at least making some attempt to correct this abuse. We have failed to correct the abuse growing out of the purchasing of tax-exempt securities. We have now an opportunity to tax these gifts. I wish to impress upon Senators that the rate is very moderate, and that, in my opinion, if the amendment is placed on the bill it will serve to prevent men making gifts to keep their fortunes in the lower surtax brackets and will have a tendency to bring in very much more revenue to the Government. I can conceive of no objection to the amendment unless we wish to abandon all hope or any attempt whatever to tax the abuse that has grown up of escaping just taxation through the making of gifts.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word. This amendment is in line with the situation to which I have at different times called attention, and brings clearly to mind the abuses which ought to be remedied. This is one of the methods whereby the high surtaxes have been evaded. It is only one, however.

The Secretary of the Treasury has called our attention pointedly to the fact that the surtaxes are being evaded. Now, instead of cutting off the surtaxes because they are being evaded, why should we not try to make it impossible to evade them? Is not that the common sense thing to do? The Senator from Massachusetts has pointed out one situation in which there are violent abuses. I have previously pointed out another situation in which there are violent abuses of the law; that is, where they have been putting their investments into corporations which make no distribution of their incomes. They have been putting their money into nondividend-paying corporations. Corporations have been retaining their revenues, their income undistributed, and the stockholders have been avoiding those surtaxes on the income of the corporations. I have proposed and the amendment will be offered in a little different form before we get through with the bill, to place a tax upon the undistributed income of corporations. That is designed for the purpose of preventing the evasion of the payment of surtaxes.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts is to prevent evasion in another way. I submit that we ought to surround our revenue laws with all the safeguards possible to prevent people from bringing about discrimination under the law in their own behalf. So long as the law permits these things to be done, we can not blame the taxpayer for doing them. But if we find that it works an evasion of the spirit of the law, if it prevents the Government from getting revenue, why should we not have these provisions in the law, so that if the evasion continues, it would be a violation of the law. It is not a violation of law now to make these gifts for the purpose of evading taxation. It is not against the law now to organize a corporation and put money into it and keep it there to evade the payment of the high surtaxes. But if we want to get these surtaxes, if we want taxation to be equal, then I say let us by law prevent a situation which warrants and invites these evasions of the terms of the revenue law.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the committee had already provided in the bill that any gift made within two years of the death of an individual shall be presumed to be made in anticipation of death, and the estate receiving such gift shall be taxed the same as though it had been retained by the owner until his death. I think that is going back far enough.

Nor is this all. There is another provision in the bill that where a gift is made and the gift is disposed of by the donee at any time thereafter, or at an advanced price over what it was worth at the time it was given, the donee shall be compelled to pay a proper tax on that transaction.

The Senator proposes to go further than this and practically to say to every man, "You are prohibited from making any gifts," and it does not make any difference what it is, except in the few instances which he has mentioned.

If there is a man who is worth a million dollars and he has an only daughter, who gets married, and he gives her an estate that is worth $50,000, he will have to pay a tax on that. If he is worth a quarter of that sum and gives his only child $25,000, he will have to pay a tax upon it. Notwithstanding the fact that he may have paid a surtax upon every dollar that he is giving away, he must pay them a second tax.

I can not see any merit in a proposition of that kind. The income that a man makes is taxed. His estate which he leaves at his death is taxed. Even though he may have given half of it or three-quarters of it away two years prior thereto, it will still be taxed. I think there ought to be some allowance for each individual to use what he has earned, what he has paid taxes upon once, to do with it as he sees fit, to give it away or expend it in any way that he sees fit, without a further tax levy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], with whom I am paired, is absent, and as I am unable to obtain a transfer I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as heretofore, and being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair as before, I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair as on the preceding ballot, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 80, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the semicolon after the word "members" and to insert a colon and the following language——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not now in order unless the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to shall be reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I will not offer the amendment now, but shall wait until we get the bill in the Senate and offer it then, unless the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] is willing that the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to shall be reconsidered and have the amendment to the amendment considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment of the committee.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee amendment reads as follows:

(5) Cemetery companies when operated exclusively for the benefit of their members:

It is proposed to add, after the word "members" and the colon, the words:

Provided, That any incorporation chartered solely for burial purposes as a cemetery incorporation and not permitted by its charter to indulge in any business not necessarily incident to that purpose, shall be exempt from taxation upon its income, but nothing in the foregoing shall exempt shareholders individually in such corporation from taxation upon any dividend or distribution accruing to them from profits made by the corporation. Such incorporations shall be exempt from corporation tax upon their capitalization.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have been pretty liberal in the matter of the reconsideration of amendments which have been agreed to so as to enable any question to be fully discussed and disposed of, if possible, as in Committee of the Whole. I therefore will consent to the reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment in this instance was agreed to, and I think the chairman of the committee will do the same.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment on page 80, lines 4 and 5, was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee to the committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I merely desire to make a brief explanation of the amendment.

In former days cemetery companies were not conducted as they are now. Take my State, for instance. We have there a statutory law under which cemeteries are made substantially charitable organizations in this way: The law provides in the State of Tennessee that one-fourth of all the cash proceeds of the cemetery company shall be applied to a trust fund and that trust fund is to be used for the perpetual upkeep of the cemetery. To tax these quasi charitable corporations, it seems to me, is a very great hardship. Under the laws of Tennessee—and I think the laws of certainly nearly all other States have a similar provision—cemeteries are exempted from all State taxation, and very properly so, because a cemetery is substantially a State institution.

We tax, I think, nearly everybody in this bill; we tax nearly everyone's income; we tax his property and in many instances we tax the property when it passes from the decedent to his next of kin or to his heirs. It seems to me that surely we might stop at the grave and not tax the grave after the dead have been put away.

In a very able and learned judicial opinion my colleague, the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], once held that taxes ought to stop at the grave, and that the grave should not be so desecrated.

So I am asking the Senate to agree to this amendment. Mind you, if any profits are made it is provided by the amendment that they shall be taxed as profits; the profits and dividends are made taxable, just as is the income of any individual.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator: That is in the hands of the stockholder?

Mr. McKELLAR. In the hands of the stockholder.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. After the distribution?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator if these corporations do actually pay dividends?

Mr. McKELLAR. My recollection is that the one that I have particularly in mind has paid a dividend of 15 per cent altogether in about the last 30 years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But these corporations are organized for profit, are they not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think they are, frequently; but——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Some of them pay enormous dividends.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I think not. I think the dividends that they pay are very, very small.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is speaking about corporations in his own State?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and I think that is so all over the country. My information is that the amount of dividends they pay is very, very small. At all events, they are taxable as income in the hands of those who receive the dividends.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; but so are all distributive dividends of all corporations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. President, that is the situation. If the Senate feels that it should tax the incomes of these cemetery companies, a large portion of which is required to be invested so as to keep up the cemeteries perpetually, which ought to be done, of course, it can do so; but I say that there ought not to be a tax placed on them. The taxes are burdensome, and I do not think they should be imposed, and I ask that that may not be done.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely.

Mr. SPENCER. Would the Senator have any objection to adding to his amendment, after the word "incorporation," the words "whose stockholders receive no dividends"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is in it.

Mr. SPENCER. No; that is not in it. In other words, as I recollect the Senator's amendment as it was read, a cemetery company that does pay dividends to its stockholders would be exempt from taxation under the Senator's amendment. Now, everybody knows that where a corporation buys land by the acre and sells it by the square foot there is a profit that is simply phenomenal; and if that profit goes to the stockholders, of course, the cemetery company ought to pay a tax. If that profit goes to the beautification of the cemetery, then I agree with the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that under the laws of Tennessee one-fourth of all the profits is taken out and put in a trust fund for the perpetual keeping up and beautification of the cemetery itself.

Mr. SPENCER. Then the Senator would have no objection to adding to his amendment, after the word "incorporation," the words "whose stockholders receive no personal advantage"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I do not think that should be done. I think a man who will use his land or my land and invest one-fourth of the profits in the perpetual beautification of a graveyard or cemetery is entitled to the greatest credit in the world and ought to be allowed to make some profit. In the case of one of the cemetery companies of which I happen to know and to which my attention has been called, my recollection is that there has been 15 per cent made in the last 32 years. I think that is a very, very small income. They have had to pay taxes on that as other people pay taxes on their income, and I think that is a very, very small income.

Mr. SPENCER. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee; that is a very small profit; but under the Senator's amendment it would be quite possible for that corporation to pay a thousand per cent dividend a year and still have it exempt from taxation.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be possible, but not probable. It never has been done, and I doubt if it ever will be done.

Mr. President, I have here a letter from the operator of one of these cemetery companies which I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD. It is short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR: Whether organized to operate for profit or not, a cemetery is essentially a quasi charitable, public concern and is usually a public charge and burden, either established and maintained by States, municipalities, and communities or by individuals on cooperative plans. The history of the past has been that throughout the United States cemeteries established and operated in either of these ways have not only been public or private burdens, but have been often deficient in character of development and maintenance, and all over the United States, in almost every city and vicinity, there are many such old cemeteries illy developed and with no adequate fund for their maintenance, many of them degenerated into melancholy ruins and neglect. For this reason the legislatures of some of the States, as Tennessee, in order to encourage individual capital to combine to provide this essential for the public and to relieve the States themselves and the municipalities and the communities from the necessity of establishing and conducting cemeteries at the public expense, have provided for the incorporation of cemetery companies or made other provisions by which individual capital may combine for the establishment and maintenance of cemeteries with the possibility of having the investment returned to the founders in the process of their operations, and to whom any possible profit may accrue. The Supreme Court of Tennessee, recognizing this quasi charitable and public character of a cemetery business in the case of Forest Hill Cemetery Co. v. J. H. Creath, trustee, et al. (127 Tennessee, 686), which was a case endeavoring to enforce an assessment of taxes against said cemetery, and notwithstanding said company is owned by stockholders and may distribute to them any net proceeds that may accrue, and for this reason it was strenuously insisted should be held liable for taxes, the court decreed as follows:

"It appears to the court, and the court doth so decree, that all lands of the complainant Forest Hill Cemetery Co., and all improvements thereon, are held for a charitable purpose within the meaning of the constitution of Tennessee, which authorized the legislature to exempt from taxation property held for purely religious purposes, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational."

And in re Railroads v. Cemetery Co., 116 Tennessee, 400, the court held that "the cities themselves might have been invested with the power to conduct the business, but the legislature * * * deeming that the duties imposed could be better discharged under the management of private persons gave to such persons in the present instance these powers to be exercised for the convenience of the cities or the public."

But such companies are subjected to restrictions and limitations and requirements inherent in the nature of their business and others which are stipulated under their charters and the laws such as are not imposed upon any other kind of business. As in Tennessee cemetery companies may not own and operate more than 200 acres of land and may not be located within specified distance of cities or towns, and under their charters 25 per cent of all sales are required to be set aside for perpetual care and protection of the cemetery after all other sources of revenue shall have been exhausted, so that only three-fourths of its capital property is left from which to provide for the cost of the property, all of the expenses of development and maintenance, interest charges, etc., and such companies can not borrow money on mortgage of the land to facilitate its business as any other business may do, the Supreme Court of Tennessee construing their charters in re Railroads v. Cemetery Co. (116 Tenn., 400), having so decreed as follows: "It is insisted that the power given to mortgage contained in the charter indicated that the cemetery was not intended for public use. We do not think anything could be mortgaged but the proceeds of lots not devoted by the charter to the purpose of maintenance. The nature of the rights secured by the charter to lot owners is such as to forbid the mortgaging of anything else."

The Cemetery Co. is compelled to hold, develop, and maintain its limited amount of land until required for burial purposes only and to suffer, besides, the loss of interest on its investment throughout the slow and restricted process.

In same case as above, the court said: "It is clear that when the incorporators of the defendant company organized under the charter and the company bought land pursuant to the powers vested that land at once became dedicated to cemetery purposes for the interment of the bodies of the dead and for the beautification of the grounds as a ministration to the sensibilities of the living. A purchase under such circumstances could mean nothing else." Therefore, the land could not be sold for any other purpose, and was also held in this case not to be subject to condemnation for any other public use.

Therefore it is plain that there is no way by which the net income of a cemetery business can be determined, for the reason that its capital property can not be liquidated. The theory and basis upon which the net income of any other business at the end of the fiscal year is determined is that its property, of which annual inventory is taken and appraised, may at that time, in an open market, be liquidated and turned into money at its appraised value. This a cemetery may not do, as explained above, and what might appear at the end of its fiscal year as a profit when the receipts are larger than the expenses and the deduction of the proportional cost price of the lots sold has been made may result in ultimate loss, because none of its remaining land, which is its capital property, can be realized on in an open market, and it therefore would be impossible for the cemetery to liquidate its business as any other business may do, though it is compelled nevertheless, as aforesaid, to continue to hold its property and to provide for maintenance and the future development of all unimproved parts. In the case of Forest Hill Cemetery Co., above cited (127 Tenn., 686), the court said: "We have not here involved, it should be especially noted, a corporation for profit that is free at will to throw off or terminate the responsibilities." And in the same case, as follows: "It may not mortgage its land or dispose of it for any purpose but the burial of the dead." And in the same case: "All the lands of the complainant Forest Hill Cemetery Co. and all improvements thereon are held for charitable purposes within the meaning of the law."

No other business is subjected to such limitations as these, and every other business may, as aforesaid, at any time liquidate, as aforesaid, thereby determining at its will its profit or loss, and is not required to continue beyond the point of active and profitable operation, as cemeteries must do. Any other business may turn over its capital repeatedly during the term of its existence, making continued profit on such new investment or output.

In contradistinction to this attitude of the States under the Federal present income-tax laws all cemeteries "operating for profit are liable," those "operating for mutual benefit are exempt." Thus cemeteries, in the language of the court quoted above, conducted "for the convenience of the cities and the public," and operating under limitations and requirements stipulated by their charters and the law and other limitations and restrictions that are inherent in the nature of that kind of business as explained above, being forced to pay taxes on their "net incomes" (always an uncertain quantity for the reasons above explained), must operate in competition to other cemeteries in the same communities which are expressly exempted under the act of Congress from taxes on their incomes. This, if not prohibitive, is in any case a condition of disadvantage and disparagement that it would be difficult, if possible, for any business to survive, and therefore it is submitted must be against public policy. And this in Tennessee under its constitution and laws as construed by the Supreme Court quoted above is plainly contemplated. The effect must be to seriously limit the capacity and policy of every cemetery business now in existence having to pay the tax, to improve, beautify, and handsomely maintain its grounds, and would effectually deter capital from in the future organizing to provide and maintain this great public necessity which in either case would be public misfortune and against the purpose and policy of the State in providing for the organization of cemetery companies under their charters as quoted above.

Forest Hill Cemetery Co. was chartered by the State of Tennessee February 10, 1892, and having been a going concern for 28 years, and one of the most handsomely developed and successful cemeteries in the entire country, during the whole period of that time up to and including the year 1919 distributed a total of only 15½ per cent in dividends, which is less than one-half of 1 per cent on the stockholders' investment, and there is no officer of the company who has received a salary, other than the secretary and treasurer, who are not stockholders; yet this company, because its sales and receipts during the last few years have been in excess of its operating expenses and the proportioned original cost of the land, has been required to pay the Federal income taxes, whereas all of which annual excess may, as indicated above, in the long stretch of years in the future result in ultimate loss.

After 28 years Forest Hill Cemetery, in the slow process of public requirement for burial space, has sold only about one-sixth of its land, and must continue its function to serve the public in this way indefinitely, at which rate more than a hundred years would be required to dispose of its capital property, and after that it still must continue to function. In any community it requires more than a generation to dispose of the land of a cemetery of average size, and that has been essentially the experience of all communities. Nevertheless, through all such time under the existing laws cemeteries like Forest Hill would be required to pay income taxes each year that its income might exceed its current expenses and the proportioned part of the cost of the whole, and in addition thereto pay annually corporation tax on its capital irrespective of profit and irrespective of the fact that under the limitations of its charter and the nature of its business it is deprived in the meantime of the possibility of liquidating its assets (land) as at any time any other business may.

Prior to the Government's assessment of the income tax and the corporation capital tax this was never a business freely entered into by capital and seldom at all except in communities where dire necessity existed to adequately or better provide disposition and respect for the dead, and future continuance of these taxes must result in inhibition. In the opinions of the court, quoted above, there are numerous cases of other States cited confirmatory thereof.

The stock in trade of any other kind of business need only be acquired in quantity to supply current and contemporaneous demand, whereas a cemetery must acquire at its foundation all that it may ever sell and continue to hold with cumulative expense and carrying charges and maintenance for all time. Forest Hill after 29 years has sold only about one-sixth of its land.

The railroad that sought to condemn right of way through an outlying part of this cemetery which in 50 years can not come into use tried to buy the right of way, at more than the entire stock of the company could have been sold for and at a time when it was conducting the cemetery at an annual loss and had never earned a dividend, yet it could not sell.

Respectfully submitted. LAURENCE LAMB.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senate to notice that the provision that has already been adopted by the Senate goes this far:

> Cemetery companies owned and operated exclusively for the benefit of their members.

There is no tax whatever upon such a cemetery, and the proposition made by the Senator from Tennessee simply means this: Half a dozen men in any city can form themselves into a company. They can go out upon some hill; they can buy the land at a nominal value per acre; they can sell that land in graveyard lots, and at such a price that after two or three years, when perhaps a quarter of the land is sold, nearly every sale of the lots thereafter is clear gain. I know of cities in the West where I think they have been the most profitable investments that I know of; and not only that, but they take only a part of the interest that they draw upon the gains to take care of the lots.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to ask this question: Do the laws of Utah, for instance, require cemetery companies to take a portion of the proceeds of sales and devote them to a trust fund for the perpetual maintenance and keeping-up of the cemetery?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, in my State it is voluntary, and it is also a part of the agreement when the burial ground is sold.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It ought to be by law.

Mr. SMOOT. The party puts in the agreement, and the purchaser must sign it, that he will pay so many dollars each year for the care of the lot. As I say, that is a part of the agreement, and that is compelled to be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think where the Senator's position is faulty is that his State ought to provide for the keeping up of the cemeteries in the up-to-date and modern way.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that if we are going to impose a tax upon all kinds of business, of every name and nature, we ought to impose a tax upon the company that goes and buys land and makes excessive profits upon the burial lots. I can not see one thing that would justify the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee. If I did not know that there were great profits in this business, if I had not made an investigation of it, I would not take this position; but what first made me do it was the fact that I was asked to go into a company of that kind.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just called attention to the language of the amendment as it was adopted some days ago. I think at the time I referred to this language. I think it ought to be amended in one respect to which I shall now refer. It reads:

Cemetery companies owned and operated exclusively for the benefit of their members.

I have in mind a cemetery in my own city which is operated for the benefit of its members, but not exclusively so; that is, they have a potter's field where they bury paupers or those who are not able to pay their burial expenses. I am afraid that under the definition as it is here, that cemetery might be subject to this tax. I do not think it ought to be.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean that they take cases that are destitute, and that fall under the provisions of a city charter, and the city pays the expense?

Mr. POMERENE. It is not a city charter; it is chartered by the State, but it is a city cemetery. Under the provisions of their charter they take the proceeds of the sale of these lots and they use that as an endowment fund to beautify and keep in repair the cemetery, and in addition to that they bury paupers or others who are in destitute circumstances.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is not for profit?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; not a dollar is profit.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I would not care if that were exempted.

Mr. POMERENE. There has never been any dividend. I know one of the leading business men who was the president of this association for 25 years or more. It was a sort of a hobby with him. He gave his time to it, and took an interest in it. He never got a dollar's profit out of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio draw an amendment to cover that case; but let us dispose of this one first. I want to suggest to the Senator that the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee is not of that character at all, and I want a vote upon that first, because I can not see any justification whatever for exempting that kind of business from taxation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is very well now and then to recur to the topic of conversation and to the real question before anybody. This amendment reads:

Provided, That any incorporation—

I ask the attention of the Senator from Utah to this—

Provided, That any incorporation chartered solely for burial purposes as a cemetery incorporation and not permitted by its charter to indulge in any business not necessarily incident to that purpose shall be exempt from taxation upon its income, but nothing in the foregoing shall exempt shareholders individually in such corporation from taxation upon any dividend or distribution accruing to them from profits made by the corporation. Such incorporations shall be exempt from corporation tax upon their capitalization.

Mr. SMOOT. That simply means that a corporation, for instance, doing a wholesale dry-goods business can not start one of these other corporations in connection with it and be exempt from taxation. That is not the way they do it. The organization of these cemetery companies is for the purpose of carrying on the business of the cemetery company, and that simply identifies them. I do not know of a single cemetery company that is running in connection with another corporation. They are corporations by themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this amendment has nothing to do with the dry goods business. It has nothing whatever to do with any other sort of business except a cemetery business. It says:

That any corporation chartered solely for burial purposes as a cemetery incorporation—

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely the point. It is to exempt from taxation the people who make money out of the burial of the dead.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I thought that that was the object of this amendment, which bears my name, I should be very much ashamed of ever having offered it. If I had the slightest idea that I had offered an amendment in the United States Senate to exempt from taxation anybody that wanted to make an income out of the dead, I should be more ashamed of it than if I had been a Massachusetts Republican offering a tax law in order to tax the people generally in order to make an income from the living. I should be worse ashamed, even; but I do not find that this bears that construction at all. To be perfectly confidential with the Senate, I had in mind a cemetery in the State of Tennessee, in the city of Memphis, an old cemetery within whose bounds a great many of my relatives have been buried. I want to have that cemetery, as a cemetery used for purely burial purposes, exempt from taxation. They never have distributed dividends sufficient to make it subject to taxation, but I put in this amendment a provision that no stockholder should be exempt from taxation on account of what he had received. Some of my forefathers and a great many of my collateral ancestors are buried there, and I know that that little cemetery should not be taxed as if it were a profit-making corporation. It never has been a profit-making corporation, and it is not one now.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if it has not made any profits, it will not pay any taxes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon. If it will not pay anything else, it will pay a corporation tax on its capitalization.

Mr. President, away back three-quarters of a century ago that cemetery was started. It has received the bodies, after their souls departed, of a great many distinguished antecedents of mine. Away back yonder, when Andrew Jackson was living and when Gen. Tom Winchester was living, they bought the land.

The Senator from Utah a moment ago said something about the increase in the price of land. It undoubtedly has increased immensely in value since the time they bought it. It was almost Indian land when it was turned into a cemetery.

I will read this amendment once more, so that the Senate can catch it. It reads as follows:

That any incorporation chartered solely for burial purposes as a cemetery incorporation and not permitted by its charter to indulge in any business not necessarily incident to that purpose shall be exempt from taxation upon its income, but nothing in the foregoing shall exempt shareholders individually in such corporation from taxation upon any dividend or distribution accruing to them from profits made by the corporation.

Mr. President, that simply means that if the corporation has never made money enough to be able to distribute any profits, has never made profits enough to declare any dividends, it shall be exempt.

I know that in certain States in the Union a bad practice has grown up, that of allowing three or four or five men, as the Senator from Utah said a moment ago, to meet and incorporate as a cemetery corporation, and then undertake almost any business in the world; but that is not the case I am striking at in this amendment. If Senators will read the amendment carefully, they will see that every corporation of that sort is excluded. I am informed that out West, perhaps in the Senator's State, men incorporate cemetery associations as profit-making enterprises, but down in the good old-fashioned States of Tennessee and Mississippi, so far as I know, that has never occurred, any more than that my plantation graveyard should be regarded as a profit-making enterprise.

My object in offering this amendment is to reach a case where a number of people come together and form a cemetery corporation merely and solely to bury people, and to make no profit out of it, except, perhaps, incidentally the profits accruing from the appreciation of the value of the real estate. In this particular case to which I have reference, where the real estate was bought while Andrew Jackson was living, there would be an immense appreciation, of course; but they did not purchase the land with that in view; that was not their purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Tennessee who offered this amendment. I am quite certain that the Senator from Tennessee does not desire that a corporation which was organized and purchased some beautiful spot for a cemetery for $10,000 in acreage, and immediately sells burial lots for $200,000, should be excused from paying a tax upon the profit it makes. I therefore suggest an amendment, which I hope the Senator will accept, and if he will I think there will be no objection to his amendment, using the usual words which are used when we desire to exempt a corporation or an individual who acts merely for charitable purposes. I propose to strike out, on line 5, after the word "income," the following words—but nothing in the foregoing shall exempt shareholders individually in such corporation from taxation upon any dividend or distribution accruing to them from profits made by the corporation.

Then insert, after the word "purpose," on line 4, just above what I propose to have stricken out, these words—no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual.

The amendment then would read:

That any incorporation chartered solely for burial purposes as a cemetery incorporation and not permitted by its charter to indulge in any business not necessarily incident to that purpose, no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, shall be exempt from taxation upon its income. Such incorporations shall be exempt from corporation tax upon their capitalization.

That would obviate the objection which is made upon this side of the Chamber, and I think would effectuate the very laudable purpose which the Senator from Tennessee has in view.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would have the effect of exempting all that part of the profits which go to the trust fund to keep up the cemetery?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, because that would not inure to the benefit of any stockholder or individual. It would simply inure to the benefit of the organization for the purposes set forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand the Senator's proposition, but I am afraid that the language he suggests would not effectuate it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the modification suggested by the Senator. I want to go further, so as to make my purpose perfectly certain. I suggest that after the word "incorporation," in the first line, we insert the word "hitherto," so that it will read:

That any corporation hitherto chartered.

I am so anxious, Mr. President, to avoid even any appearance of trying to make a profit out of the dead that I do not want any possibility of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would not be necessary to put in the word "hitherto," because if it applies to one corporation it ought to apply to another, and I can see no objection to it whatever if it is amended as I have suggested.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well. I have no objection to the modification suggested by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the language I have suggested striking out will be left out.

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as I am able to do so, I am glad to accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. KING. In my own time, may I inquire of the Senator whether the amendments offered by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from North Dakota have for their object the exemption of the corporation itself from any corporate taxes?

Mr. McCUMBER. The object is to exempt them from any corporate taxes so long as they are exclusively engaged in the business referred to, and so long as all of their income is used to beautify the cemetery, and to be expended upon the cemetery, and no part of its profits are to inure to the benefit of any stockholder or individual.

Mr. KING. But suppose some of its profits are distributed in the form of dividends; while it is true that the distributees would pay their normal taxes or their surtaxes according to the extent of their incomes, I see no reason why the corporation itself in a case of that kind should not pay its corporate tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would, except under the terms of the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the profits are distributed, it comes without the provision of this amendment.

Mr. KING. If that is the case, I have no objection.

Mr. McCUMBER. It permits the profit to be used for public purposes and for the most worthy purposes for which it could be used, the keeping up of the cemetery.

Mr. KING. I had in mind the statement of my colleague, and I can corroborate his remark. I know that many of the corporations have charged extravagant prices for the lots which they have sold, and have made very large profits. Corporations of that character ought to pay the same as other corporations organized for the purpose of making profits, whether in trade, or commerce, or anything else.

Mr. McCUMBER. If all profits are utilized for beautifying the cemetery and keeping it up, they ought not to have to pay.

Mr. KING. That is a different thing.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all there is now to the amendment. The Senator from Tennessee accepts the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I accept it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am willing to accept it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, I ask the Senator to agree to strike out the word "incorporation" wherever it occurs, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "corporation," so that it will conform to the language generally used throughout the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I accept that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree to that.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask the chairman of the committee to accept a further amendment. If it does not meet with his approval, it can be taken care of in conference. On line 4, insert the words "cemetery companies owned or operated exclusively for the benefit of their members, or which are not operated for profit."

Mr. McCUMBER. That, I think, is merely repeating what is in the amendment already.

Mr. POMERENE. I would say so, except for the peculiar language in lines 4 and 5.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. It can be stricken out in conference, if the Senator is of opinion that it is not necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is an important amendment to be considered, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that provision of the bill on page 148 was adopted in order that I may offer an amendment to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is one of the bloc amendments which was considered and reconsidered, but I think we might as well dispose of it now as to have a motion in the Senate. So I have no objection to another reconsideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the provision referred to was adopted will be reconsidered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The READING CLERK. On page 148, after line 17, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in addition to taxes heretofore levied by this section a tax of 10 per cent shall be imposed upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred, by whatsoever authority issued, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess profits tax laws, and which were issued prior to the passage of this act; and that upon such tax exempt securities issued subsequent to the passage of this act the additional tax so levied shall be 15 per cent: Provided further, That the foregoing provision shall not apply to bonds issued under the authority of the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916, or any acts amendatory thereof, or to stocks issued under the authority of a Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, or any acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I call for order. This is an important amendment, and I think we ought to be advised of the contents of it and ought to have an opportunity to hear whatever may be said relative to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I asked for the reading of the amendment because I was desirous that Senators, who will be called upon presently to vote upon it, may understand its provisions. I doubt if half a dozen of the Senators now present heard the reading by the Secretary. I ask now to have it again reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The reading clerk again read the proposed amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to compel securities which have not paid taxes during the life of their owners to make up for it by an extra transfer tax upon the death of the owner. It applies solely to tax-free securities. I think that every Senator and I know that every member of the Committee on Finance has been profoundly impressed by the importance of dealing in some way with the vast amount of wealth which is being invested in tax-free securities and is escaping altogether bearing any part of the burdens of the support of Government.

Various estimates have been made of the amount of these tax-free securities. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], speaking the other day upon this subject, said that the tax-exempt securities held in this country amount to $16,000,000,000. On the same day the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] stated that he had seen estimates that the amount of tax-exempt securities was $20,000,000,000.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield, but I must remind the Senator that I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I know it, and I shall ask a very brief question. How does the Senator escape the legal question——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall come to that in just a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quote now from a memorandum furnished me by the Legislative Reference Library:

> There are at present $14,000,000,000 worth of tax-exempt bonds, enough to absorb the entire wealth of persons in the United States having an income of $100,000 or more, thus enabling all those wealthy persons who would otherwise pay the highest income taxes to avoid paying any taxes whatever. If these bonds were all held by persons with such incomes and the average return on those bonds was 5 per cent, the minimum of taxes to the Federal Government would be $280,330,000 and the maximum $464,240,000. In 20 years this would amount to a minimum of $4,000,000,000 and a maximum of over $9,000,000,000 in taxes.

I quote from the New York Evening Post of March 19, 1921, the following:

> Guy Houston, president of the American Association of Joint Stock Land Banks, in 1920 estimated the taxes from securities of all kinds outstanding as follows:

Municipal, county, and State bonds	$7,000,000,000
Special assessment bonds on cities	1,000,000,000
Municipal bank securities	3,000,000,000
Building and loan associations' securities	1,700,000
First and last Liberty loan bonds	4,000,000,000
Federal reserve banks' stock	87,000,000
Farm loan bonds	300,000,000

The two last items in the list I have exempted from the amendment which I have offered. I have just one more authority to quote upon this subject.

The Wall Street Journal, under date of August 19, 1921, reports a meeting of the Chicago Mortgage Bankers' Association addressed by its president, George H. Taylor, who said—and I quote his words:

> Were the tax-exempt privilege entirely withdrawn, there would be approximately $16,000,000,000, aside from Liberty bonds, amenable to taxation. This at the normal income tax rate would yield nearly $1,000,000,000 annually and would relieve the people of huge tax burdens and divert amazingly large sums from nonproductive to productive uses.

I find in the testimony before the House Ways and Means Committee a statement by a banker and member of one of the large bond houses in this country, Bache & Co. Mr. Bache is at the head of one of the large financial institutions of the country. He states here that he has prepared, as he is drifting toward the close of life, to put all his investments into tax-exempt securities, so that his estate will not have to pay any inheritance tax to the Federal Government. He was asked how much he had spent in promoting the sales-tax propaganda——

> Mr. BACHE. I have spent more than I can afford to, in view of my taxes, because I am getting out of business, putting my money into municipal bonds as fast as I can.

Again, he said:

> You may amend your Constitution to make future municipal bonds tax bearing, but you can not make past ones. I am not a lawyer, but you can not make the sixteen billions, or whatever amount there is outstanding, to be taxed. That is quite large enough to cover our large fortunes.

That is where they propose to put their large fortunes. Now, can they be reached? I say they can. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court, by other court decisions, and by law, Mr. President, from an early date in this country it has been determined that property of a State or municipality may not be taxed, because to do so would be to tax instruments of government. From this it has been made to follow that for the Federal Government to impose a tax upon securities issued by a State or a municipality is in effect a tax upon such State or municipality and consequently is a power which the Federal Government can not exercise. The leading case upon this subject is entitled The United States v. Railway Company (84 U. S., 97). All Senators are familiar with it. The amendment which I propose is not a tax upon property at all, but it is a tax upon the privilege of transferring property either by will or under intestate law. In such a case it would come, rather, under the head of excise taxes and not properly as being a property tax at all.

Mr. President, I will stop to let the chairman of the committee have the floor if he wants it. He indulges in conversation that can be heard all over the Chamber every time a Senator is speaking, without regard to whether a Senator shall be heard or not.

Everybody knows that the leading case on this subject is that of Knowlton against Moore, One hundred and seventy-eighth United States, which holds that the United States as well as the State may levy inheritances taxes, and that the tax is not one on property at all, but is on the privilege of succession and is in the nature of an excise.

In Flint v. Stone Tracy Co. (220 U. S., 107) the Federal corporation tax is carefully considered and held to be constitutional, the court saying, on page 158, that the tax is within the class which Congress is authorized to levy and collect under article 1, section 8, of the Constitution, and described generally as "taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" upon which the limitation is that they "shall be uniform within the United States." This last case is not directly in point, but is valuable for its discussion of the principles of taxation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will occupy such time as I may for the further explanation of my amendment under the provision that I may speak upon the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is entitled to 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask to have account kept of my time, that I may reserve whatever I may have left after I shall have finished, for I shall only occupy a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is entitled to speak only once on the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I shall have to submit to that, because I want to go on for a moment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for the time being. There may be some amendments offered to this amendment; but let me say—I hope I may be indulged for a second—if any Senator wants to suggest an amendment to the amendment which I have proposed which proposes to fix a 10 per cent tax and a 15 per cent tax—a 10 per cent tax on outstanding tax-exempt securities and 15 per cent——

Mr. PENROSE. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. PENROSE. It is that the Senator from Wisconsin has exceeded his time by several minutes under the rule.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not exceeded my time by several minutes, though I have exceeded it by a few seconds; but I will yield to the order of the Chair and surrender the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, evidently the Senator from Wisconsin was intending to discuss, briefly at least, the question of the power of Congress to levy taxes of this character. As to that there is no doubt whatever.

There is undoubtedly a very legitimate market for securities of the character referred to in this amendment, securities that bear a low rate of interest, that ordinarily are purchased and go into the hands of the trust companies and savings banks and trusts for individuals and other persons who are under guardianship. They are not a legitimate field of investment for men of great wealth who are desirous of escaping Federal taxation. Certainly something ought to be done to discourage, at least so far as we can, the investment of funds in securities of this character which ought to be invested in industrial and other securities.

The question is addressed to the Senate as to whether we have the power to enact a statute of this character. Mr. President, the provisions of the bill as they now stand will reach undoubtedly securities of this character which may be in the hands of a decedent at the time of his death; in other words, if a man dies having no estate whatever except such ordinarily tax-exempt securities, they would still be subject to the tax provided in the bill as it is now written; but it will be borne in mind that from the time these securities were issued down to the time of the death of the decedent they have escaped Federal taxation altogether, and accordingly that particular kind of scurity ought to bear a heavier burden when it is transmitted on the death of the owner of the property.

The subject was exhaustively considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred, the case of Knowlton against Moore, reported in One hundred and seventy-eighth United States, page 41, but the particular subject had special consideration from the Supreme Court in a decision on a case heard at the same time, entitled Plummer against Coler, reported in One hundred and seventy-eighth United States, page 115. The principle is succinctly stated and in a brief manner in Judson on Taxation, as follows:

SEC. 582. State securities are not exempt from Federal inheritance taxes: The exemption of State agencies and instrumentalities from Federal taxation does not extend to the exemption of State and municipal securities from a Federal inheritance tax. These last are subject to Federal taxation on the same principle that Federal securities are subject to a State inheritance tax. The tax is upon the right of inheritance and not upon the property inherited.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator did not give the page from which he read. Will he state it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I read from section 582 of Judson on Taxation.

Mr. President, the exact question was not determined in Plummer against Coler, to which I have referred, reported in One hundred and seventy-eighth United States, page 115, but what was decided in that case is briefly expressed in the syllabus, from which I read:

The right to take property by will or descent is derived from and regulated by municipal law; and, in assessing a tax upon such right or privilege, the State may lawfully measure or fix the amount of the tax by referring to the value of the property passing and the incidental fact that such property is composed, in whole or in part, of Federal securities, does not invalidate the State tax or the law under which it is imposed.

So, Mr. President, if an estate consists altogether of Government bonds which the State can not tax at all, those Government bonds may be made to pay an inheritance tax as they pass from the former owner to the party upon whom the property devolves pursuant to will or the inheritance law. In other words, it is decided in this case that the State can tax Federal securities; that is, an inheritance tax may be levied on their passing; and it follows of necessity that the Federal Government, accordingly, can impose an inheritance tax upon State securities on the passage of State securities or other obligations of that character. There is no possibility of distinction between the two, so that the case of Plummer against Coler may be regarded as a direct adjudication of the question before us.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to hear the Senator upon the other proposition, whether we can segregate State securities and impose upon them a higher rate of taxation or a higher rate for the passing of those securities by death than we do upon other property of equal value?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not see why we can not make a classification. The point is that securities that are not exempt from taxation pass under one rule and under one amount, while property which is exempt from taxation ordinarily passes under another rule. It has occurred to me that that forms a perfect basis for a different classification of rates.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is true, we can destroy the real value to the State of that character of securities when it desires to sell them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was the argument that was made in the cases of Knowlton against Moore and Plumer against Coler, namely, that if the States were permitted to impose an inheritance tax upon property of this character at all it might utterly destroy the value of the security; but the Supreme Court said that that contention was too remote, and they would not pay any attention to it. That was the argument upon which the case proceeded. It was contended that if the power was granted to the States thus to tax securities of the United States in the course of devolution it would destroy the value of Federal securities. I have not the time to refer to the case, but I could quote the language of the court in the case to which I have referred.

Mr. POMERENE. The inheritance tax is upon the corpus of the estate, and it is entirely regardless of the character of the securities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Really, it is not on the corpus of the estate, but it is upon the right to take it, and it is measured by the amount of the corpus of the estate.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has expressed the idea more accurately than I did.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So that, so far as the legal aspect is concerned, there is no objection to this amendment, and upon its merits I do not believe that anything substantial can be urged against it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the point in the case has not been touched at all, and that is this:

A bond is a contract, and the terms of it are carried on the face of the bond. Whether or not the Federal Government should issue tax-free securities is not the question here before us to-night. Whether States, counties, and cities should do it is not the question. The amount has nothing whatever to do with it. The question is, Can a bond which is tax free by the contract made between the State or the Government and the man or the woman who pays over his or her money on the faith of that contract be changed?

The Constitution says that we can not impair the obligation of a contract. If I had a $1,000 tax-free bond—which I do not have—it would, in my possession and ownership, be free from tax. The Senator from Montana will not dispute that, nor will the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The very question which the Senator now is discussing has also been decided by the Supreme Court. It was held in the case of Federal securities that were expressly declared to be exempt from all taxation that the Federal Government could tax them nevertheless.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Where is the decision?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In Knowlton against Moore.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should be glad to have the Senator read it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will do so later; not just now.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I should be glad if the Senator would. That is simply an indirect way of doing what you can not do directly. If a $1,000 bond in my ownership is tax free, and it goes at my death to my grandchildren, that provision of the contract remains inviolate until the bond matures; otherwise you impair the obligation of that contract.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to amend the pending amendment by striking out, on line 2, the words "of 10 per cent shall be imposed upon," and inserting "equivalent to 10 per cent of."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I accept that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the junior Senator from Wisconsin explain just wherein that differs from the amendment as originally offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the original amendment in its terms imposed a tax of 10 per cent upon the value of these tax-exempt securities. I believe that we have the right to impose an estate tax, and to measure the amount of that tax by anything we choose, so long as it is applied upon all estates in the same way; so that my view of this amendment is that we are merely measuring an additional tax upon the entire estate by the value of the exempt securities.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, then, we are rather beating around the bush; and if there is any question of constitutionality—which I can not discuss—of tax-exempt securities already held we will raise the estate taxes by an amount equal to an additional 10 per cent, thus covering those same tax-exempt securities indirectly.

Mr. LENROOT. We do not raise them 10 per cent upon the entire estate, but we raise the tax upon the entire estate in an amount equal to 10 per cent of the value of the tax-exempt securities.

Mr. EDGE. That is what I meant.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is not the distinction to be drawn in this way, that the tax is not upon the tax-exempt securities, but it is upon the privilege of inheritance?

Mr. LENROOT. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, since the junior Senator from Wisconsin has offered an amendment to the amendment of the senior Senator from Wisconsin I desire to address myself to that amendment.

Reference has already been made to the case of Murdock against Ward, heard at the same time as Knowlton against Moore, and reported in the same volume.

The argument in this case turns at last upon the proposition that, by the exempting clauses in the statutes and on the face of the bonds, the United States entered into a contract with those who should buy and hold the bonds that neither principal nor interest should be taxed. Whether the United States, in the exercise of the power of taxation, can be estopped by a contract that such power shall not be exercised, we need not consider, because the contract in this case does not, as we view it, mean that a State may not, or the United States may not, tax inheritances and legacies, regardless of the character of the property of which they are composed.

The point being, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut just now, that the tax is not on the property at all, but upon the right to have it devolve upon the successor in interest.

That some of the holders of United States bonds may have paid franchise taxes to the States and others may have paid State or Federal inheritance and legacy taxes has nothing to do with the contract between the United States and the bondholders. The United States will have complied with their contract when they pay to the original holders of their bonds or to their assigns the interest, when due, in full and the principal, when due, in full.

So here, in the case of State securities, the contract is between the State and the person to whom the securities are issued. The State is obliged to pay these securities to whomever they may be due; but a tax levied on the right to take them must be paid, not by the party with whom the contract was made at all but by some one else, with whom no contract was made, but who claims to have the right to acquire these securities either by virtue of a will or by virtue of the inheritance laws of the State.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from North Dakota has just suggested to me this question: Suppose the State stipulates in the bond that the purchaser of the bond shall be free from any Federal inheritance tax; what will the Senator say about that?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, no declaration that a State might make to the effect that the bonds should be exempt from Federal taxes could be of any force or effect whatever. The power of the Federal Government to impose taxes, if it has that right, as a matter of course can not be impaired or restricted in any way by any declaration or any action whatever on the part of the State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, suppose that the State law which provides for the issuance of a bond provides that the bond and interest thereon shall be free from any tax, inheritance or otherwise, and stops right there, and the bond carries a rate of interest so low that it would appeal to people who desired to be freed from both classes of tax. Can the Government of the United States come in and destroy the very purpose that the State had in view in selling those bonds at a lower rate of interest, and perhaps receiving a greater amount because of their being tax free?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the same question that was addressed to me by the Senator from Connecticut. It does not make any difference what the State declares about the tax-exempt character of these bonds; it can not affect the power of the Federal Government, and, of course, the purchasers of these bonds must have known that. Notwithstanding that declaration, which was intended to mean that the State itself would not levy any inheritance tax upon the bonds or upon the right to succeed to their ownership, no man with any discretion or knowledge even of business would believe that that declaration upon the part of the State was binding on the Federal Government and that the Federal Government would not levy any inheritance tax upon the acquisition of property of this character.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will permit me at that point——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have given the matter no consideration, but if the State does make a contract to that effect, and if the Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall not pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract, how does the Senator reconcile the constitutional provision with the claim that he makes?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I should say, in the first place, that the contract would be nugatory, because it is beyond the power of the State government to prevent the Federal Government from levying such taxes as under the Constitution it may levy; and, of course, the purchaser with knowledge of the law knows that that is the case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I am aware of the fact that the provision of the Constitution is not that the National Government shall not pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract, but that no State shall pass such a law; but in my opinion it would be held that the National Government likewise could not pass a law impairing the obligation of a contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I merely desire to say, in answer to that, that no one can contend that the provision of the Constitution preventing the States from impairing the obligation of contracts is applicable. The State does not impair the obligation of the contract at all. The provision is that no State shall impair the obligation of a contract. The State is not impairing it. If it is impaired in any way, the contention is that the Federal Government has impaired it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; but I say what the Federal Constitution would prohibit the States from doing it prohibits itself from doing, in my opinion.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, a hasty examination of this decision does not seem to show that the question of tax-free obligations was passed on.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood so. The language seems quite plain.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I say that is the result of a hasty examination. I have had only a moment to look at it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The court says:

The argument in this case turns at last upon the proposition that, by the exempting clauses in the statutes and on the face of the bonds, the United States entered into a contract with those who should buy and hold the bonds that neither principal nor interest should be taxed.

And they dispose of that by saying the point is not well taken.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. In that case there was a divided decision, and the Chief Justice went the other way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, referring to the query of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], I do not know that any State has ever issued any bonds guaranteeing the holder of the bonds in specific terms against an inheritance tax by the United States; and I should like to inquire of the Senator from Connecticut if he knows of any such case.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, no, Mr. President; I do not; but my information about that would be of no value. I have not heard of any. I have not made any inquiry about it. My inquiry was simply suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, who put a supposititious case.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I will ask the Senator from North Dakota if he knows of any such case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not the owner of any of those securities, so I have not examined any of them to see just what their terms are, nor have I examined the laws of the several States. I can very easily understand why, if a State felt that the Government was going to levy any kind of a tax upon its securities it would be very quick to find means by which it would declare that its securities should be free from both the ordinary tax and the tax upon estates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It could not do that. A State could not exempt its own securities.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I was led to ask this question because I should think it would be a very unusual procedure for the States to go beyond the usual form of legislation upon this subject. I can not recall any case where there has been any reference to the tax laws and the inheritance laws of the United States, and I think the objections which are raised in that regard are wholly without any concrete cases to support them. If we are permitted to levy an estate tax at all, it would seem to me that that does not constitute any tax upon the obligation of the State. It is either a tax upon the transfer of the property or it is not.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. First stating that I think that is evidently an evasion instead of an argument, I want to call the attention of my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the fact that the court expressly refused to consider the very question which I raised.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have heretofore called attention to what I thought the Federal Government should do in these circumstances; that is to say, instead of taxing the estates, taking the transfer of the property from the ancestor to the heir, we should tax income, should levy an inheritance tax, a special tax upon the income which the heirs receive by way of inheritance. Such a provision would eliminate all these questions; but I have never contended that a law of this sort would be unconstitutional; I think it is constitutional.

I believe, however, that the better way to reach the proposition is by an inheritance tax rather than by an estate tax, because this tax of 10 per cent which the Senator from Wisconsin proposes is a tax upon the estate regardless of the number of heirs, and to that extent may be an unequal method of taxation. If there are a large number of heirs, they are taxed upon the total of the estate; and as I have previously argued we should have an inheritance tax, and that would remove the inequality to which I have referred, and it seems to me it would remove all question of taxation of these securities, because in such case it would be a tax upon income received no matter from what source. But I must say that I can not see any constitutional objection to this sort of a tax.

I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not. That amendment was accepted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. This is a very important matter, and inasmuch as we tax corporations upon their total income a flat 15 per cent, for the purpose of giving an opportunity for fuller discussion of this matter, I move to change this tax of 10 per cent proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to 15 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suppose everyone who has given any attention to this question, even the most superficial, realizes the extreme injustice that is caused by this great body of tax-exempt securities, and I know that many efforts have been made to reach them in some way; but the decisions of the courts, and the Constitution, seem to stand in the way of taxing them, certainly in the hands of living persons.

In the case of Pollock against Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., the decisions in the cases involving the taxation of municipal bonds are summed up in a very able opinion. But this is not the question of a tax on the securities. It rests, as all inheritance taxes must, on the right of transfer, as the Senator from Connecticut has pointed out.

The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] called my attention to a recent case, which seems to me of such importance that I am going to take the liberty of reading it to the Senate. It is in Two hundred and fifty-fourth United States, the case of Watson and others, executors of Watson, against the State Comptroller of the State of New York, and came up on a writ of error. The Supreme Court said, in that decision:

> The occasion and the purpose of the statute are shown by the court of appeals. An owner of investments is not required either to list them for assessment locally under the general property tax law or to present them for stamping under the investment tax law. Whether the investments of a resident are taxed during his life depends either upon his own will or upon the vigilance and discretion of the local assessors. This condition led to loss of revenue by the State and to inequality in taxation among its citizens. To remedy both evils this additional transfer tax was imposed upon investments of a decedent which had wholly escaped taxation. It is insisted that the tax is discriminatory because under it other property of the same kind bequeathed to persons standing in the same relationship to the decedent will not be taxed. But the power to classify for purposes of taxation is fully established. The executors admit, as they must, that a classification is reasonable if made with respect to the kind of property transferred; or to the amount or value of property transferred; or to the relationship of the transferees; or to the character of the transferee, for instance, as engaged in charity. (Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 170 U. S., 283, 300; Billings v. Illinois, 188 U. S., 97; Campbell v. California, 200 U. S., 87.) But their list does not exhaust the possibilities of legal classification. (See Beers v. Glynn, 211 U. S., 477, 484; Keeney v. New York, 222 U. S., 525; Maxwell v. Bugbee, 250 U. S., 525. Compare Hatch v. Reardon, 204 U. S., 152.) Any classification is permissible which has a reasonable relation to some permitted end of governmental action. It is not necessary, as the plaintiff in error seems to contend, that the basis of the classification must be deducible from the nature of the things classified; here the right to receive property by devolution. It is enough, for instance, if the classification is reasonably founded in "the purposes and policy of taxation." (Pacific Express Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S., 339, 354; Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S., 730, 732; Clement National Bank v. Vermont, 231 U. S., 120, 136–137; Farmers Bank v. Minnesota, 232 U. S., 516, 529–530.)
> And what classification could be more reasonable than to distinguish, in imposing an inheritance or transfer tax, between property which had during the decedent's life borne its fair share of the tax burden and that which had not?

That seems to cover the principle in this case pretty clearly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LODGE. In one moment. I have not concluded the reading of the case, and I should like to finish the citation.

> It does not follow, as is also argued, that the act in question imposes a property tax merely because its existence may induce owners of investments to present them for taxation under the investment tax law. Nor is it to be deemed a law imposing a penalty merely because the decedent's estate may under it be required to pay more in taxes than the deceased would have paid if he had presented his property for taxation under the investment tax law. Whether this additional transfer tax would be obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment if it could be deemed a property tax or a penalty we have no occasion to consider.

That decision seems to me to be of great importance as establishing the right to classify property when imposing a tax on the transfer of property, not on the property itself but on the right to transfer.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That does not touch this case at all.

Mr. LODGE. Very likely; I thought it did.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I have no doubt the Senator from Massachusetts thought so, but this Senator does not think so.

Mr. LODGE. I supposed it included it; but we all have a right to our opinions.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Of course we have, and I have a right to mine. I did not intend in the least degree to be discourteous to the Senator, but I wanted to point out to him that that decision does not touch this case, for the reason that nothing is said there about tax-exempt securities.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. He could not have listened to what I read. It specially mentions tax-exempt securities.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I did not hear that part of it. The court did not decide that question in the other case, and did not decide it in this, as I understood it.

Mr. LODGE. The language of the court is:

> To remedy both evils this additional transfer tax was imposed upon investments of a decedent which had wholly escaped taxation.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Investments which have escaped taxation are not the same as investments which are tax exempt.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They could have been taxed during the lifetime of the decedent.

Mr. LODGE. Not necessarily.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is a very different proposition from tax-exempt securities.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree with the senior Senator from Massachusetts in his interpretation, but the fact is that the property involved consisted of securities which could have been but were not taxed during the decedent's lifetime.

Mr. LODGE. There is no mention here of the precise property involved.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It refers to certain property that escaped taxes which, under the laws of New York, was taxable.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. There is plenty of property which escapes taxation and which, if found, can be taxed. That often happens. But, Mr. President, the proposition is this: It is fundamental, constitutional law, that when the Federal Government, or a State government, or county government, or town government makes the contract, and gets your money on the faith of that contract, and a part of the contract is that that bond shall not be taxed, as long as that bond runs that obligation runs with it. That obligation is a part of the contract, and if the Congress endeavors to impair the obligation of the contract the Supreme Court will, in my judgment, knock the law all to pieces.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it is carrying the Pollock case pretty far to say that a State can make a contract which can exclude the right of taxation on the part of the United States. They have no power to make a contract in a case of that sort beyond their own boundaries. Whether it shall be respected by the United States is another question; but certainly the case I have read indicates that the principle of classification for the inheritance tax is well recognized.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the senior Senator from Wisconsin a question, and he can answer it in my time. I noticed when the amendment was read that it exempted farm loan bonds. Those farm loan bonds are held by the same people who hold the other tax-exempt bonds of the Government, purchased in the same way. Why should they be exempted?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will answer that very plainly, Mr. President. If the amount of the investment in these bonds was as inconsiderable as that which is invested in farm loan and Federal reserve bonds, there would have been no thought of resorting to any method of reaching the property that is so invested; it would have been so inconsiderable as to be unimportant. Therefore, I thought it would be entirely proper to exempt them from taxation, because I thought it would embarrass the sale of those bonds if the amendment which I propose applied to them, and the condition of agriculture is such to-day that I did not wish to impose any such additional burden on it. That is the plain English of it. I thought it entirely proper to exempt those from the scope of this proposed amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that when we are legislating it ought to be upon principle, and I do not believe that we ought to pass a law that we can tax a horse but that we can not tax a colt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Utah interposes an objection to that provision in my amendment, and makes an objection to it, I am so anxious to have this matter dealt with by the Senate in a serious way, because I believe it is one of the most important problems with which we have to deal in this matter of taxation, that I will myself withdraw that proviso from the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is perfectly satisfactory, but I wish to say to the Senator that I have been very much interested for a long time in the question of tax-exempt securities and the drying up the revenues of the Government. During this session of the Congress I have offered a resolution providing for a constitutional amendment authorizing the taxation in the future of tax-exempt securities. Of course, I think they ought to be taxed. I think the Constitution ought to be amended, because if it is not amended and we go on issuing these bonds as they are being issued to-day, it will not be long until that fountain of revenue to maintain the Government of the United States will gradually dry up and we will have to raise our revenues from some other source.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am very much in sympathy with the object of this amendment and regret that there are such large holdings becoming exempt from taxation. I have been inclined to support the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States in order that tax-exempt securities might be subject to Federal taxation. However, there are many powerful and persuasive arguments that may be urged against a policy that would subject State and municipal securities to the taxing power of the Federal Government, and there are some who have indicated that in the long run the Federal Government would suffer by a policy which denied it the right to issue tax-exempt securities. However, I shall not enter upon a discussion of that question.

I have not had occasion to examine the question under discussion or the authorities cited by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and I do not know just how far those decisions support the position for which those Senators are contending. There is a legal question of great importance involved in the proposition to subject the securities of States and political subdivisions thereof to Federal taxation. It would seem at first blush that the assertion by the Federal Government of this power is dangerous to the integrity of the States and other political subdivisions.

Remembering as we do that the power to tax is the power to destroy, and keeping in mind the principles enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall in the McCullough case, it would seem to be the course of wisdom and prudence to scrutinize with the utmost care propositions such as those involved in the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. It is essential that sovereign States and their political subdivisions should have the power to issue bonds and other securities. The States have vital functions to perform. They are charged with the responsibility of looking after domestic and internal affairs. The life and health and education of the people are committed to the States. Who shall say that their functions and responsibilities are not as important as those of the Federal Government? They more closely enter into the lives of the people than does the Federal Government. Their preservation is important. It is as vital to our form of government that the States be preserved in all of their vigor and power and sovereignty as it is that the Federal Government shall be unhampered in the exercise of its national authority. The Federal Government must issue bonds and other securities from time to time, and it would be fatal to its authority, and perhaps to its existence, if the States of the Union could tax without restraint such securities. So the States might be destroyed if there were no limitations upon the power of the Federal Government to tax the securities and obligations of the States and their municipal governments.

The founders of this Republic perceived the importance of maintaining the sovereignty of the States, and realized that that sovereignty might be destroyed if the power existed in the Federal Government to lay the heavy hand of taxation upon its bonds and securities. It can easily be conceived how a strongly centralized government desiring to weaken, if not destroy, the States could insidiously attack them under the guise of taxation and ultimately devitalize them if there were no limitations upon the power of the Federal Government to tax the States. It is a dangerous thing to commit to the Federal Government the authority to diminish or destroy the value of State securities. It is contended, however, that the Federal Government does not tax the securities of the States and State municipalities under this amendment, but that it seeks only to tax the "transfer" of State securities. There is no purpose, it is claimed, to tax State bonds or other State securities while they are in the hands of the living, but that such securities become the subject of Federal control for purposes of taxation when the owner dies. It may be said that this is an evasion of the spirit, if not the letter of the law, and permits to be done indirectly what may not be done directly. It would seem that if Congress may not tax such securities when in the hands of the living it should not tax them when they pass to the ownership or control of the heirs or the estate of the deceased.

It would seem that if the transfer of the shares of State securities upon the death of the owner is subject to taxation, it is an indirect, if not a direct, attempt by the Government to tax the securities themselves. One of the reasons why State securities are not taxed is because it would diminish the value of such securities, and it is not conceivable that the States would permit the Federal Government to destroy the value of their securities. The States are as interested in obtaining par, or perhaps more than par, for their securities as is the Federal Government in securing the highest prices for its securities. Obviously if the Federal Government should tax the State securities in the hands of the living or at the time of their issue it would diminish their value, and it seems to be clear that if the Federal Government may tax such securities during the process of devolution occasioned by death of the owners, the value of such securities, even at the time of issue or in the hands of the purchaser, would be diminished. The value of State securities in part is found in the fact that they are not only tax exempt but it has been believed that they were not subject to taxation when transferred by probate court procedure or other transfer brought about by the demise of the owner.

Let me present an illustration of the point I have in mind. Suppose the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] should desire to leave his family a fund from which they might derive an income for their support. He might invest in the securities of his own State or of the municipalities of the State of Wisconsin. If, however, it were known that the Federal Government would, upon his demise, be permitted to "classify," to use the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], such securities and place them in a different category from other property and impose upon them a perhaps confiscatory tax under the guise of taxing the transfer of the securities, then the Senator might refrain from purchasing such securities; and his action undoubtedly would be followed by others, and still others, until finally there would be little, if any, sale for the securities and the State of Wisconsin and its municipalities would thus be seriously injured. It would almost amount to a direct attack upon the validity of the State securities, and certainly an attack upon their value; and an attack upon their value if it progresses far enough to materially affect the same becomes tantamount—in its effect, at least—to an attack upon the validity of the bonds, and therefore an assault upon the States.

It would seem that if the Federal Government may classify State securities and differentiate them from other property and impose a heavy transfer tax upon the theory that they had escaped taxation in the hands of the purchasers from the State, it would possess the power to destroy all State securities, and that this power to destroy the States would soon reduce them to impotency. They would become mere anemic and pallid organisms fit only to be devoured by an omnipotent government.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. WATSON of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts, because he rose first.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be very brief. Apparently the Senator draws a distinction between bonds already issued and those about to be issued; that is, bonds now issued and bonds of future issue.

Mr. KING. I can see that there might be a distinction, conceding the power of the Federal Government. I should be glad if the Federal Government could tax many of these tax-exempt securities and I am in sympathy with any legal and just plan to reach the same. However, the point I am trying to make is that there is danger of legislation that will impair the power of the States and their political subdivisions and destroy in part at least the value of their securities. I fear that State securities, if we concede the power of the Federal Government to impose unlimited burdens on the transfer, will lose their value in part.

Mr. LODGE. I am drawing a distinction between those already issued and those to be issued.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that there might be such a distinction.

Mr. LODGE. I stated that it was a question of the right of classification, but I have, I confess, very grave doubts about the right to tax any bonds already issued.

Mr. KING. I hesitate to express an opinion upon the question because I have not given it sufficient consideration, and I shall not do so. I yield now to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I wish to suggest what the Senator has largely anticipated, that if the Federal Government can tax at all it can tax all the value out.

Mr. KING. Absolutely.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The power to tax is a power to destroy.

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. If we once set an example or establish a precedent and make the law, others may come here and abuse it, and those securities may have their value taxed out of them and thus the innocent holders of those securities may be robbed under form of law.

Mr. LODGE. It could only be done in the case of a transfer. It is perfectly well settled that in the case of a living man it can not be done.

Mr. KING. If we concede the power of the Federal Government to tax State tax-exempt securities, then under the pretext of taxing the transfer of such securities the tax might be placed so high that it would be practical confiscation of the securities.

Mr. LODGE. They could not tax those that already exist.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Transferring the contract can not change the obligation thereof.

Mr. KING. If we may tax the transfer which may result from death, why may we not tax the transfer while the man is living? Securities are bought and sold and transfers made by men while living.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Precisely.

Mr. LODGE. The right to transfer is one thing and the State—I do not mean the State in our sense, but the Government—the Government can control it. They could not transfer the property if it were not for the probate laws.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I share in part the views expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin and deprecate as he does the evils that result from the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few. And I agree that there may arise difficult problems because of the enormous holdings by comparatively few individuals of tax-exempt securities, Federal and State.

I object to many of the provisions of this bill because of the exemptions and deductions permitted and because of the discriminations which seem to me to deny all maxims of equality in taxation. I have opposed features of this bill because I have regarded them as unjust and as granting special privileges to wealth. It may be that upon further examination of this question—and as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I have had no opportunity to examine into the subject—I may be willing to support this amendment or measures of similar character.

When legislation is proposed that apparently strikes at the States, or weakens their sovereignty, or confers upon the Federal Government power to interfere with the local and domestic affairs of the States, it arouses my suspicions and compels me to carefully scrutinize the same. I confess that I am jealous of the rights of the States because I perceive an almost irresistible movement which has for its object the devitalization of the States and the transference of the power and authority reserved by the people to themselves and possessed by the States to a Federal Government which seems to be reaching out for greater power.

One would think from the projects constantly submitted from all parts of the land that there were no limitations upon the Federal Government and that its authority was unrestricted. There is a growing tendency to deny constitutional limitations and to attack the very spirit which underlies our form of Government. Many of the people seem entirely willing to reduce the States to pitiful and helpless appendages of the National Government. They seem anxious to transfer to the National Government the authority belonging to the States and to surrender those rights, privileges, and prerogatives which, if exercised, develop a vigorous, patriotic, and self-governing people, competent to deal with all political and economic problems and able to hold aloft the standard of liberty. I desire further opportunity to examine this question before I am willing to support the amendment.

The amendment will be popular and will find many reasons in its behalf. It may be that my apprehensions are not well founded and that there are preponderating reasons warranting the adoption of the amendment. However, for the present I shall withhold my assent because it looks as though it is calculated to militate against the integrity and authority of the State and the political subdivisions therein and will affect injuriously the securities issued by the States and their municipalities.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Would it not be immoral as well as unethical to do a thing like that?

Mr. KING. It would seem, Mr. President, that to destroy the value of tax-exempt securities issued by the States and their municipalities would not only be unethical, if not immoral, but would also justify the contention that the legality of such act was subject to question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have given some thought to this particular subject, and I have no doubt whatever with regard to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. We already are taxing State securities in the way proposed in the amendment. We have been doing it for a long time. I think there is no longer any doubt respecting our power to tax the transfer of an estate to descendants or devisees, even though that estate be composed entirely of tax-exempt securities.

I think the analysis of the subject presented by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is entirely conclusive. The only doubt I have had with regard to the amendment was introduced by the exemption of the Federal farm loan bonds. The only question that can ever arise with respect to the matter, in my judgment, is one of classification. If the Supreme Court finds that the classification is a reasonable one, the legislation, I think, will endure any scrutiny that will ever be put upon it. I do not think that we could tax an inheritance composed entirely of State securities and exempt the Federal securities which were also tax exempt. That would not be a reasonable classification. I believe that the Supreme Court would overturn it if it should ever reach that tribunal.

I am not sure that the single exception of Federal farm loan bonds would render the classification unreasonable, but I am so anxious to find some way by which these tax-exempt securities can be made to contribute to the burdens of government that I was very glad when the Senator from Wisconsin withdrew that part of his amendment. I think it is an eminently just provision. We are trying to distribute these burdens as equitably as we can. It is not an easy task, and we are not doing it very successfully at best, but this is one of the provisions which will help to make the bill equitable.

I have had a great deal of difficulty as we have gone on voting here in determining how I should vote, for I was opposed oftentimes to the original proposition and opposed to the amendment as well, and under those circumstances it was very difficult for me to determine just what I ought to do. However, I have no doubt whatever with regard to this particular provision, and I earnestly hope that it will become a part of the bill before it is passed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the pending matter, as I understand, is the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I take the liberty of addressing myself to the Senate a few moments longer upon the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is under the impression that the suggested amendment by the Senator is not permissible, being beyond the scope of amendments, namely, an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not understand that any point of order was raised.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not raise it, but thought it proper to call it to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I assume, if the Senator from Montana will allow me, that the Chair is supposed to rule in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement, and of course the Senator from Montana would not violate that unanimous-consent agreement under any circumstances. A unanimous-consent agreement has been entered into that no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes on any amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am speaking now to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is an amendment to the pending amendment, as I understand. If it is an amendment to the pending amendment, of course we are discussing the same amendment. I do not understand that we can offer an amendment to an amendment and discuss it 10 minutes, and then offer another one and discuss that 10 minutes, and keep on without a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I venture to say that it has been the construction always given to these matters, that an amendment to an amendment may be offered and debated, just the same as the original amendment which it seeks to amend.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have never understood that under a unanimous-consent agreement of this kind; otherwise such an agreement is almost worthless.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not disposed to cut off discussion or debate on this particular amendment, but deems it his duty to advise the Senate of the status of the matter.

Mr. LENROOT. A parliamentary inquiry. Does the Chair hold that if an amendment is offered to the amendment the unanimous-consent agreement prevents the discussion of that amendment because 10 minutes have been occupied on the original amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not disposed to decide that matter.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well; I thought not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not know what the ruling or the custom of the Senate has been, nor is he out of hand disposed to make a ruling.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I submit that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico——

Mr. McCUMBER. I raise the point of order so that it may be decided, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harrison	Nelson	Smith
Broussard	Heflin	New	Smoot
Cameron	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Spencer
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Stanley
Cummins	Kendrick	Norbeck	Sutherland
Curtis	Kenyon	Norris	Townsend
du Pont	Keyes	Oddie	Trammell
Edge	King	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	La Follette	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Lenroot	Penrose	Warren
Fletcher	Lodge	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
France	McCumber	Pittman	Watson, Ind.
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Reed	Weller
Gerry	McKinley	Sheppard	Willis
Gooding	McNary	Shields
Hale	Moses	Shortridge
Harris	Myers	Simmons

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now make the point of order that under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator from Montana, having spoken once, can not speak again while the amendment is pending, and I am asking the Senator from Montana to take that view of the matter in order that we may keep sacred our unanimous-consent agreement. That agreement reads—quoting only so much of it as is pertinent:

> And that from the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. on the last-named calendar day, and thenceforward, no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may then be pending or that may be offered, or more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon the bill.

What amendment is now pending to the bill? The amendment to the bill now pending is the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. I want to make my point clear.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me say that that is the real question. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is not the question now pending at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have the floor now, and I will make the question clear before I get through, if the Senator will allow me.

The very fact that the Senator from New Mexico desires to perfect the amendment by changing a word in it does not change the fact that that is the matter now pending. Let us see what is the purpose and spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement. Suppose the Senator had originally presented his amendment with a rate of 5 per cent and spoken for 10 minutes, and then moved to change the rate to 6 per cent and spoken for another 10 minutes, and then moved to change the rate to 7 per cent and spoken another 10 minutes, and so on. In that way there could be violated what was intended by the unanimous-consent agreement; that is, to get through with this bill—and that was the only purpose of it—and convert a 10-minute rule, which we all expected would result in the final disposition of this bill, into a 40-minute or a 400-minute rule, simply by changing the figure in the rate proposed by the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I merely wish to say a word. If proposing an amendment to an amendment is to give the right to a Senator to speak for 10 minutes, the whole spirit of the unanimous consent, in my judgment, is destroyed; it is rendered valueless.

Mr. LENROOT. I call the attention of the Chair to the point which the Senator from North Dakota makes. The language of the unanimous-consent agreement is "any amendment that may then be pending or that may be offered." What that refers to is the amendment that was pending at 10 o'clock this morning and that might then be pending at 10 o'clock this morning. Then the agreement goes on to cover what may be offered after 10 o'clock this morning. It clearly gives a right to speak for 10 minutes upon any amendment, whether it is an amendment to the original bill or an amendment to an amendment. We have never had a unanimous-consent agreement in the Senate that has not followed exactly that procedure.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that be true, the unanimous-consent agreement is valueless.

Mr. LODGE. If that be correct, the unanimous-consent agreement is not worth the paper upon which it is printed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico rose.

Mr. LENROOT. Just a word. When the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into the present occupant of the chair will remember, because I recall that he participated in the debate, it was suggested that the privilege might be abused. Some Senator said there might be amendments offered that would delay the passage of the bill. I then suggested—I think the RECORD shows it—that if that were so the abuse could easily be prevented by a Senator moving to lay amendments upon the table, and thereby prevent debate where the amendments were not offered in good faith.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire also to call attention to the answer that was made to the present occupant of the chair, which was that such a privilege would not be abused, and it has not been abused. I am sure that no Senator will abuse it. I understood the agreement just as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has stated it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word, if the Chair will bear with me. An argument has been made that the contention we strive for can not be maintained because thereby the debate would be prolonged indefinitely. That is no argument at all, because the debate may be prolonged indefinitely in exactly the way suggested by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], whether his contention is sustained or not. Let us suppose that this amendment is voted down. Then the Senator from New Mexico, if he cares to do so, may offer an amendment in exactly the same language as the amendment tendered by the Senator from Wisconsin, the rates of which shall be only 15 and 20 per cent or 11 and 16 per cent, and that would give rise to debate again. Indeed, Mr. President, that has been done repeatedly here; that is to say, an amendment has been offered to a particular provision of the bill, with certain rates within certain brackets; that has been voted down, and then another amendment has been tendered with slightly different rates. That is no answer to the question at all.

Of course, Mr. President, the privilege may be abused; it may be abused under the contention that we make with respect to the proper construction to be given to the unanimous-consent agreement, and it may be abused under the contention of the Senator from North Dakota; but that is no argument at all. Let me put this question to the present occupant of the chair: If the Chair were to be interrogated now, "What is the question before the Senate?" what would he be compelled to answer? He would be compelled to answer, "The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin." Why is not every Senator entitled to 10 minutes to discuss that amendment to the amendment? How can we differentiate between an amendment to the bill itself and an amendment to an amendment which is tendered? The unanimous-consent agreement is that 10 minutes shall be accorded each Senator upon any amendment. I claim that privilege.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I make the additional point of order that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is in the third degree. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as I recall, proposes to amend an amendment offered by the committee, and therefore an amendment to that amendment is an amendment in the third degree, if I have the record correctly in mind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if a Senator on this floor proposed an amendment and the Senator from North Dakota spoke 10 minutes against it and then some other Senator proposed an amendment to that amendment could not the Senator from North Dakota rise and tell the committee's position on the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am simply saying that an amendment to a pending amendment is not in order. That is the only question involved in my last statement.

Mr. President, I would just as soon have a ruling and have the matter disposed of.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Chair may make any ruling desired, but it will not save a minute's time; I will tell the Senator that.

Mr. McCUMBER. That may be the case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the case.

Mr. McCUMBER. That may be the case. I fully realize that the Senator from Wisconsin may take all the time and offer as many amendments as he wishes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator may rest assured that I will do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have tried to hurry the matter along——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is trying to hurry it now.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that an agreement into which we entered may not be abused. That is all there is to it. I think I have a right to stand upon that agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the Senator see how far he will get.

Mr. McCUMBER. That may be; we may not get anywhere.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me this discussion of a parliamentary rule is taking a great deal more time than the amendment ought to take up; but in order to demonstrate that this amendment is not proposed for the purpose of consuming time, or anything of that sort, I withdraw the amendment and will let the Senate vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to say, for the record, that I requested the Senator from New Mexico before he left the Chamber 15 or 20 minutes ago to withdraw this amendment, in order that we might have a vote.

I have sought no delay here. I want a vote upon this proposition. I regard it of vital importance that we should foreclose great wealth from the opportunity to escape taxation, and that is what this amendment does.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, as modified.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, by reason of the amendment that I proposed, that was accepted by my colleague, two other formal amendments are necessary. If necessary, I ask unanimous consent to have those incorporated.

In line 2, after the word "section," insert the words "there shall be imposed."

In line 9, before the word "fifteen," insert the words "equivalent to."

These are merely formal amendments, to correspond with the language used in the first part of the amendment.

Does my colleague accept those amendments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I accept those amendments, Mr. President; and I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment as modified.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is absent. As I am unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He is not in the Chamber. I therefore transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent. I am unable to obtain a transfer, and withhold by vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, and being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HALE. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS]. I have not been able to transfer that pair, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McKINLEY (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that my general pair, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. DU PONT (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL]. I thought that he was here, but he is not; so I shall have to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK].

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 33, as follows:

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before the amendment as amended is agreed to I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he proposes to offer an amendment covering this question as to securities issued subsequently to the passage of the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 148, after line 17, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That in addition to taxes heretofore levied by this section there shall be imposed a tax of 15 per cent upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred, by whatsoever authority issued, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess-profits tax laws and which were issued subsequent to the passage of this act.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, that is exactly the same as the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], except that it applies only to securities issued after the passage of this act; and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as anyone can see from what I have said before in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, I think that tax-exempt securities are productive of very great injustices, and I wish we could find some way of taxing them that is reasonable. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would appear to meet that object, but the more I considered it the more impossible it seemed to destroy by retroactive legislation the value of securities already issued, and which depended upon the contract already made between the State and the purchaser of the bonds. I do not see how that can possibly be done. For that reason, I voted against the amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] avoids that by making it in the future, and I should be glad to vote for it if more consideration had been given and I felt better assured of the constitutionality of the amendment. I think that matter ought to be decided, for I think something must be done to prevent this deluge of securities which lead to wasteful local expenditures, owing to the ease with which such bonds are now sold from the fact that they carry a general tax exemption. At this stage I do not feel confident enough in regard to it, in my own opinion, to vote to put it upon this bill. I only desired to make that explanation of my vote.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. I want to suggest an amendment to the Senator from Iowa. The language is "securities issued." Securities are frequently issued a long time before they are actually negotiated or sold by the State; at least that construction could be given. A State issues its certificates, and then they may hold them two or three years before they negotiate them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not understand that it applies simply to State securities.

Mr. REED. The Senator is correct. I was speaking purely from recollection, and just for illustration. I am not trying to state the exact language. I would have to have the bill before me to do that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, may we have the Secretary state the amendment again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 148, after line 17, insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That in addition to the taxes heretofore levied by this section there shall be imposed a tax of 15 per cent upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred by whatsoever authority issued, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess-profits tax laws, and which were issued subsequent to the passage of this act.

Mr. REED. I beg to suggest the amendment to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection to it, but I really do not see the necessity of it. Does the Senator want to add the language "issued and negotiated"?

Mr. REED. No; "issued or negotiated."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me suggest to the Senator from Missouri that there is no limit to the time of negotiation. You never could tell when the negotiation had been completed until the actual sale.

Mr. REED. I have in mind an issue of over $50,000,000 of bonds. They were issued; they were taken to the market. Those offering the bonds did not get the price they thought they ought to get, and they have simply withheld the bonds from sale.

Mr. KENYON. Those bonds would have been issued prior to the taking effect of this act, and it would not apply at all.

Mr. REED. Exactly, and I think the act ought to apply, because they have not been sold, and no moral reason can be offered why they should be held free from the tax, if the securities that are sold the same day in the market, but which were issued subsequent to the approval of this act, are taxed.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator wants this to apply to bonds which have been sold?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My point was simply that the word "negotiation" was rather indefinite as applied to such a contract. I have no objection to making it apply to any contract which has been made.

Mr. KENYON. Why not, then, use the words "issued and sold"?

Mr. REED. I think that language would cover my criticism.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "Issued and subscribed for," or some such language.

Mr. SPENCER. That would not cover what the Senator from Missouri has in mind, because the bonds which he has in mind would have been issued prior to the taking effect of this act, but sold since. Evidently that amendment would not cover it.

Mr. KENYON. The bonds the Senator has in mind have been issued.

Mr. REED. They have.

Mr. KENYON. Consequently, they would be subject to the tax.

Mr. SPENCER. No; because they were issued prior to the taking effect of the act.

Mr. REED. We are all so tired we are not thinking very clearly. I think a provision covering bonds "sold by" the governmental agency, whatever it is—because you do not want to tax everything that is sold by anybody else—would cover the situation.

Mr. SPENCER. "Sold by the original obligor."

Mr. REED. Yes; "sold by the original obligor." That will do.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator will offer that amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall vote against this amendment for the same reason that actuated me in voting against the other amendment, and I want to state it most briefly.

The Supreme Court decision which held that the Government or a State could not tax an instrumentality of another State or of any other jurisdiction was based upon the principle that to a certain extent, at least, such taxation would affect the instrumentality or function of another sovereignty, and that the Government of the United States has no right to tax an instrumentality of a State government, as it might thus destroy the effectiveness of that State government.

To illustrate: Suppose my State issues bonds for a million dollars, bearing 5 per cent interest, which are nontaxable. It can then sell them for a hundred cents on the dollar. If they were taxable by another State or by the Federal Government, possibly it could not sell them for more than 90 cents on the dollar. Therefore their exemption from taxation is for the very purpose of enabling the State to market them at par.

Suppose we say that they shall not be subject to taxation by the Government or by any other authority, but may be taxable under an estate tax, and that we can make it 10 per cent, or 20 per cent, or 40 per cent, or even 90 per cent. Possibly you would not destroy their selling value, but you would affect it, and you would violate the principle just as much by the imposition of the estate tax as by the imposition of any other kind of a tax, and there ought to be some instrumentality of a State free from any and all taxes for its own protection. That is why I have voted against amendments of this kind and will continue to vote against them, not on the ground that they are impairing the obligations of a contract, but that they are impairing the right of a State to say that one of its instrumentalities may not be taxed in any form whatever, past or future, and I do not want to deprive the State of the right to exempt its own instrumentalities.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to take this occasion to state that I voted for the last amendment which was proposed under an entire misapprehension. I heartily agree with what the Senator from North Dakota has just said. Though it may be indirect, this is certainly taxation by the Federal Government of the instrumentality of a State. It is not accurate to say that it is a mere matter of taxing the transfer of securities. In justice to myself I feel that I should state that I voted under a misapprehension.

I shall therefore vote against this proposition, which involves identically the same principle. It is self-evident, needs no argument, everyone knows that it means an attack upon an instrumentality of a State.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. We are now taxing the same kind of securities under the present law. Would the Senator favor exempting all tax-exempt securities from the present estate taxes?

Mr. SMITH. I would exempt the instrumentalities of the State, according to the constitutional provision that the securities of a State shall be free from the interference of the Federal Government. The minute you admit the principle that the Federal Government can tax the instrumentality of a State, and carry it through, you concede that it has the power to destroy entirely the State government.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, this amendment in effect would authorize the Federal Government to say to the States, "You shall not issue securities of a certain sum. Your cities shall not do it. Your counties shall not do it." The moment Congress gave this Government that right, we would lose almost every shred of State sovereignty. We would at least surrender to the Federal Goverment rights which have been those of the States and their subdivisions ever since the foundation of the Government.

Another thing, Mr. President. It has been said here repeatedly that such a law was passed two years ago, during the war period. A great many of us think that many of the laws passed under the tremendous pressure of the war period were unconstitutional. But the war is over. If Congress did wrong in 1916, that is no reason why Congress should do wrong now.

President Harding went into office under the motto "Let us return to the Constitution." Let us do that very thing. Let us help him to do it. Let us get back to the Constitution. Let us reclothe the States, as far as we can, with all the sovereign rights which they reserved to themselves when they voluntarily created this Government under limited terms.

Mr. SPENCER. I want to suggest an amendment to the Senator from Iowa. The reason of it is this: Undoubtedly this amendment of his, as it is now drawn, does limit the negotiability, so far as its value is concerned, of the security issued by a State. Of course, if the State of Missouri were to issue its securities, which are now tax exempt, either during life or when they pass by inheritance or by bequest, if we tax the estates which have those tax-exempt securities and eliminate the tax exemption when they pass by inheritance or by bequest, we have in a sense diminished their salability; that is unquestioned; there can not be any doubt about that.

I have no great objection to announcing to the country, if the Congress wants to do it, that hereafter the securities of States which are tax exempt during the life of the owner shall have a tax imposed upon them when they pass from their owner after his death. But it is not fair to do that all of a sudden. It is not fair to do that, as the amendment of the Senator from Iowa provides, immediately upon the passage of this act, which may be next week, which probably will be this month. It is not fair to say that thereupon all those securities shall lose the tax-exempt character which they now have, and upon the strength of which many States, Missouri included, have already issued their bonds. In Missouri the bonds are not yet sold, but they will be sold, though not until after this act is approved.

If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa prevails—and I use this as an illustration—when those Missouri bonds are sold, as they will be next month, they will have lost their tax-exempt provision, so far as a State and inheritance is concerned. That is not fair. It is not fair to make the amendment apply to an issue of bonds which has already been arranged for, which have already been issued, which are already in existence, or on the eve of issue and the sale of which has already been arranged for and is about to be consummated.

What I suggest to the Senator from Iowa, if it meets his good judgment, and if it does not I am not going to offer it as an independent amendment, is that he insert in his amendment, which now reads, "which was sold by the original authority issuing them," the words "after six months subsequent to the passage of this act."

Fairly that takes away from the operation of the amendment those issues the arrangements for which have already been completed. In other words, anything that is sold within the next six months after the amendment becomes the law, if at all, will not be subject to the amendment, but it does apply to serve notice to the country that for the future, after six months, the amendment will apply.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator think the adoption of the amendment will affect the sale of bonds issued by counties and States?

Mr. SPENCER. It is perfectly clear that they would have less salability in the future if the amendment is agreed to. Of course they will. I can buy a tax-exempt security to-day with the knowledge that I can leave it to my children and that it will be tax exempt in my hands and when it passes through my estate. When this amendment becomes the law, the latter exemption is lost and that security will have no exemption when it passes through my estate, and just in proportion as that affects its value will its salability be diminished.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think there is a great deal of merit in what the Senator says, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I have offered, and, as I have now perfected it, I will offer another amendment instead of that one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has the right to withdraw his amendment and to offer another.

Mr. KENYON. I withdraw it and will offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 148, after line 17, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in addition to taxes heretofore levied by this section there shall be imposed a tax equivalent to 15 per cent upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred by whatsoever authority issued, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess-profits tax laws, and which were sold after six months subsequent to the passage of this act by the authority issuing the same.

Mr. KENYON. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word. For weeks Senators on the other side of the Chamber have been insisting that the Republican side has been attempting to free wealth of its just proportion of taxes, and they have insisted, in amendment after amendment, upon imposing still greater taxes upon wealth than have been proposed upon this side. But now we have a situation where the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and others agreeing with him, take the position that although men of very great wealth investing their millions in tax-exempt securities may pay nothing for the support of the Federal Government and can not be made to pay for that support because of the tax-exempt character of the securities which they hold, they insist that even when we have the power, if it be granted that we have, to tax their heirs or legatees through an estate tax, something upon which their testator has escaped taxation, that nevertheless they not only would oppose this amendment but they would repeal existing law which does tax as a part of the estate all of these tax-exempt securities now held.

I do not know how some Senators upon the other side of the aisle are going to reconcile the professions which they have been making for weeks here upon this floor with the position which they now take.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, upon which the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question and he being absent, I must withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I am unable to obtain a transfer of my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). Again making the announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when Mr. SIMMONS's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as I did before with reference to my pair, and being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KENDRICK. Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HALE. Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRISON. Transferring my general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] is paired with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

So Mr. KENYON's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. KENYON. I reserve a separate vote on the amendment just voted on when the bill reaches the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to propound an inquiry to the Senator in charge of the bill as to the language found on page 33, line 5, in the clause beginning with the word "Income" down to and including the word "spouse" on line 9. It is my information and understanding that that has been stricken from the bill. Am I correct in that supposition?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That clause has been stricken from the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out, on page 38, all of paragraph (2) as amended, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title.

I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a word of explanation. The law as it now stands exempts from taxation all interest received on Liberty bonds, and so forth. The House bill allows no exemption for interest on Liberty loan securities. The Committee on Finance then reported that interest paid on loans incurred for the purchase of tax-free securities could be deducted. The Trammell amendment, which was adopted, provides that the only interest which may be deducted is the difference between the interest received and the interest paid. On a further investigation it was found that the law upon the statute books which was passed at the time we provided for the issuance of the Liberty loan bonds and the Victory bonds was to the effect that interest paid upon money borrowed for the purpose of purchasing those bonds should be exempt from taxation.

The Treasury Department in making its "drive" to secure the necessary sale of Liberty bonds declared in its advertisements that the interest paid on any money borrowed for the purpose of assisting in that drive should be allowed as a deduction from incomes. It seems to me that as the matter now stands, with the amendment which has been adopted, the provision I have moved to strike out would be a violation of the law and the agreement made at that time. The amendment is for the purpose of striking out all the section and to leave in force the old law, which allows a deduction of all interest paid upon loans which were secured to buy Liberty bonds without reference to what interest the holder received upon the bonds. The whole provision ought to go out, and we ought to leave the law as it now is.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I understand the Senator; and, in my own time, may I inquire of him whether the effect of his amendment would be to extend deductions to those who having acquired bonds originally purchased from the Government, after they have passed through a number of hands, take those bonds to the bank and borrow money upon them and put it into some business?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President. If I borrowed a thousand dollars to purchase Liberty bonds at the time they were issued by the Government, if I renew the same indebtedness, so long as it continues, the interest which I pay upon that may be deducted under the present law. Under the proposed law, as amended by the amendment of the Senator from Florida, I could only deduct the difference between the interest which I paid upon my obligation and the interest which I received upon the Liberty bonds.

An original purchaser of bonds may have been compelled to pay 6 or 7 or 8 or 10 per cent for the money borrowed, while he receives only 4½ per cent interest on the bonds, and where the borrowings were very heavy and the debt has not yet been paid the provision which has been adopted is extremely hard upon such a purchaser and, I think, in violation of the law as it then stood and of the agreement which was accepted when individuals borrowed for the purpose of purchasing Liberty bonds.

Mr. PENROSE and other Senators. Vote!

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am going to have a few words to say before we have a vote. Some Senators like to sit around and cry "vote" all the time whenever they think some other Senator is going to speak in a way that does not particularly please their fancy. I do not propose to be disturbed by demands to vote.

Mr. President, if it is desired to preserve the pledge which it is contended was made to the American people in connection with the purchase of Liberty and Victory bonds, then why the necessity for extending the provision of law to the speculators who have purchased such bonds since the war? Certainly the Government held out no pledge to the speculators who have been purchasing Government bonds at ridiculously low prices, that if they went into the market and purchased the bonds at eighty-three, eighty-four, or eighty-five dollars the Government would exempt the interest on all the money they borrowed for that purpose. I submit that if we feel there is a moral obligation—and, of course, there is no legal obligation—to remit the interest to those patriotic citizens who borrowed money for the purpose of purchasing bonds during the war, that obligation does not extend to the speculators in bonds who borrowed money for that purpose.

I do not believe, however, that we are doing any injustice to anyone when we provide that the interest shall be exempt only to the extent of the amount that is paid upon the indebtedness over and above what is received upon the Government obligation. Of course, if we do not so provide, if we take the other position, we have made the Government bonds available for speculative purposes upon borrowed capital. The purchaser receives his interest tax free, and, in addition to that, the Government exempts to him 6 or 8 per cent interest that he borrowed for the purpose of purchasing Government bonds.

It is my opinion that Congress can not be too generous toward those who patriotically during the time of need on the part of their Government borrowed money for the purpose of purchasing bonds; and I am not complaining that of any relief that it is attempted to extend to that class of our citizens; but my position is that we should so qualify the law that the deduction should not be allowed in the interest of speculators in bonds, bond brokers, and, I may say, in many instances, bond sharks, because it was due largely to their manipulations that Government bonds were held down at such a low price for two and a half or practically three years after the war.

I say, if we are going to strike out entirely the amendment which has been agreed to, certainly we should put a provision in the law that the exemption shall apply only to the purchasers of bonds at par. That will reach back to the original purchase by our patriotic citizens who were actuated by motives which impelled them to do all they could within their power to assist the Government. They are deserving of consideration; but, so far as the speculators who have borrowed money and are borrowing money now for the purpose of purchasing bonds are concerned, they certainly should have no more interest deducted than the difference between the interest paid and the interest received upon the securities. I hope the Senate will take no action that will so far destroy the amendment which has been adopted as to give the speculators the benefit which may properly be given to the original purchaser. I hope the motion will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida says that there is no legal obligation on the part of the Government to allow a deduction of the interest paid on money borrowed to purchase Government bonds. I myself thought so when I spoke here the other day, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the law as it exists to-day. That law specifically exempts the interest that is paid for carrying Liberty bonds or Victory notes.

In section 234, under the heading "Deductions allowed," the existing law reads as follows, and this is the law under which the bonds have been purchased:

(2) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on its indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917) the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title as income to the taxpayer, or, in the case of a foreign corporation, the proportion of such interest which the amount of its gross income from sources within the United States bears to the amount of its gross income from all sources within and without the United States.

When this question was up before I referred to a circular that had been issued by the Treasury Department in connection with the sale of the Victory notes under the Victory loan campaign.

A day or two after that I put into the RECORD the exact wording of the circulars that were issued to the American people, in which the Treasury Department asked the American people to purchase these tax-exempt notes, and in the circular are given a number of tables showing the advantages that accrued to the purchaser of these notes because of the very fact that they were tax exempt, and from the further fact that if they were compelled to borrow money from a bank or any other place, whatever rate of interest they paid would be exempt by way of deduction from their income. That has been the practice ever since the act of 1918 became a law; that is the practice to-day; and the motion of the Senator from North Dakota now is simply to strike out, on page 84, paragraph 2, which will leave the law just as it is to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I insert the law, then, as it is to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. And to insert the law just as it is to-day. By the way, so that I will not forget it, I will call the Senator's attention to the fact that the same amendment, if this is agreed to, must be offered for the individual.

Mr. McCUMBER. In two other places.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt my colleague if I should ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. KING. The position which my colleague takes, it seems to me, is perfectly sound, but the position of the Senator from Florida, as I understand, is that if the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota should prevail, individuals who now go and buy bonds for the purpose of speculation, and take those bonds to a bank and pledge them as collateral to secure the loan, would be allowed a deduction of the interest paid to the bank.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the existing law; yes. As far as I am concerned, if the notes had not been issued under that law—and the value of the notes is based on the law itself—then the position taken by the Senator from Florida would be perfectly proper; but just as surely as this amendment as reported by the House becomes law, the Victory notes will immediately drop in value. It will not affect the speculator, because the speculator will get out from under, but it will affect the man who has carried those notes from the day that he purchased them, and has been paying interest upon the obligation. I know that there are a great many persons that are doing that to-day.

Mr. President, so that the record at this time may show just what inducements were held out to the American people to purchase these tax-exempt bonds at a low rate of interest during the war, I ask that the Secretary may read the provisions of the circular which I send to the desk.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Does the Senator contend that that law would exempt, not the man who purchased the bonds when the campaign was on, but the speculator who bought the bonds at 84 cents on the dollar and then took them to the bank and borrowed the money? Would that interest be exempt?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the 3½ per cent tax-exempt Victory notes have never been down to 84 cents on the dollar.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, when they were 90 cents on the dollar?

Mr. SMOOT. No; they were even higher than that. This is what would be the result: The price of the bond is based upon the law under which the bond was purchased.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is, by the original purchaser?

Mr. SMOOT. No; by any purchaser. It makes no difference who it is, whether it is the original purchaser or a purchaser from the original purchaser. The price depends upon what the rate of interest will be to the purchaser; and the law to-day specifically says that all interest that is paid upon money borrowed for the purpose of carrying these tax-exempt securities shall be allowed as an exemption. The amendment, as I say, simply carries out existing law.

If the Secretary will read the two paragraphs that I have marked, the Senate can see just what was said to the American people.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think that means the original purchaser. I have some of those bonds. I borrowed the money to pay for them. If I turn around and sell them to John Smith and John Smith takes them to the bank and borrows money on them, then is his interest to be exempt?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the result of a proposition of that kind would be that John Smith would not give as much for the bonds to the original holder as he will if he has that exemption, and the law says that he shall have it.

I ask that those two paragraphs be put into the RECORD. I will not have the time of the Senate taken to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

A. The direct saving to individuals from an investment in Victory notes—in normal tax in the case of the 4¼'s and in both taxes in the case of the 3½'s.

The 4¼ per cent Victory notes, besides bearing the highest rate of interest carried by a United States obligation since the Civil War, are exempt from normal tax. This means an advantage in the case of individual holders subject to income tax ranging from 4 per cent in the case of those subject to the lowest normal tax to 8 per cent in the case of the higher incomes. In other words, 4¼ per cent income exempt from normal tax is equivalent to income subject to normal tax and surtax ranging from 4.95 per cent when subject to the lowest rates to about 6.15 per cent when subject to the highest rates.

Victory notes of the 3½ per cent class are wholly exempt from both normal and surtax. This exemption is a clear advantage in income as contrasted with fully taxable investments bearing the same rate of interest ranging in the case of individual holders subject to income tax from 5 per cent in the case of those subject to the lowest 1919 rate of surtax to 73 per cent in the case of those subject to the highest 1919 rate of surtax. In other words, 3½ tax-exempt income is equivalent to taxable income ranging from 3.94 per cent when subject to the lowest rate of surtax to 13.89 per cent when subject to the highest rate of surtax. See Table I.

D. Advantage from deductibility of carrying charges.

For the purpose of computing net income subject to income and excess-profits taxes, all interest paid or accrued within the taxable year is deductible from gross income, except interest on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry tax-exempt securities other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917. It is therefore permissible for a purchaser of either the 3½ or the 4¼ notes to borrow the purchase price and deduct interest paid from his gross income without being subject to any tax upon the income received from 3½ notes so purchased and carried and without being subject to the normal tax upon the income received from 4¼ notes so purchased and carried. This applies to corporations liable to excess-profits tax as well as to individuals liable to surtax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, as I understand the proposition now before the Senate, it is to accept the present law without the amendment which was originally reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. That is it.

Mr. REED. The law as it stands is:

All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on its indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917) the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title as income to the taxpayer.

If the law is passed now, and we reenact this law, this privilege will continue indefinitely—that is, the privilege of taking the bond, putting it into the bank, borrowing the money, collecting the interest on the bond without paying any taxes, and deducting from your tax returns the entire interest paid to the bank. That presents a very different question from the proposition reported by the committee originally, for the proposition brought in by the committee added this to the act:

Provided, That in the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922, there shall be allowed as a deduction interest paid or accrued during such taxable year and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, even though the interest therefrom is so wholly exempt.

As I understand that phraseology, it is intended that the privilege to which I have referred shall cease after next year, and there was no objection by anybody as to the fairness of that proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that is really what I intended, and I think the amendment which I have offered is subject to the criticism that it does not carry out that intent. My intention was to have it cover only original borrowings for the purpose of carrying on this campaign to raise the money; and with the Senator's permission and with the permission of the Senate—then it will all be in conference—I should like to change my amendment by inserting, after the figures "1917," the words "and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer." That is really what I intended, and in my opinion that is as far as it should go.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that meets the objection that I was raising. Now, just a word that I think is worth uttering here.

We passed an act levying taxes and in that act we provided for credit upon returns of interest paid to banks in order to carry these Government bonds. That act was passed before the bonds were sold, and therefore every man who went to the bank and borrowed money to carry the bonds was entitled to rely upon the provisions of that act for at least a reasonable length of time; but I do not think he had the right to rely upon that tax law never being changed. It was quite a different proposition from writing the obligation in the bond itself. I think, therefore, we are perfectly justified in passing the amendment as it has been suggested—that is, to give these people who borrowed the money an opportunity to get their obligations discharged—but I am utterly opposed to carrying that privilege on indefinitely, because it might result in very great loss to the Government.

I am in favor of the amendment as now proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota as finally modified.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to have the amendment stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 38, beginning on line 9, it is proposed to strike out subdivision (2) in the House bill as amended and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after Sept. 24, 1917, and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer), the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title.

Mr. REED. I am not sure the amendment is in proper form, but it can go to conference in that form.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, how does that restrict it to the original purchaser? There is so much confusion in the Senate Chamber that we can not hear the amendment as it is being read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will be order in the Senate Chamber. The Secretary will read the portion of the amendment referred to by the Senator from Florida.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that necessitates two other amendments of the same character, on different pages; and I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 84, strike out all of paragraph (2) as amended and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on its indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917) and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer, the interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I also offer the following amendment, which is substantially the same, to apply to another section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 106 strike out all of paragraph 8 as amended and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(8) All interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on its indebtedness, except on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations or securities (other than obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917) and originally subscribed for by the taxpayer interest upon which is wholly exempt from taxation under this title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 7, paragraph (b), I ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the committee on lines 19 to 23, inclusive, was disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 7, lines 19 to 23 were stricken through when the bill was reported, and upon a vote the amendment was disagreed to, retaining the House text, as follows:

(c) Amounts distributed in the liquidation of a corporation shall be treated as in part or in full payment in exchange for stock or shares, and any gain or profit realized thereby shall be taxed to the distributee as other gains or profits.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out those lines.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was disagreed to, but after that there was a further amendment inserted which changed to a considerable extent the law, which now makes it proper to agree to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, Mr. President, I move that we reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 7, lines 9 and 10, and down to the word "corporation," on line 11, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment which was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment was as follows: On line 9, strike out the word "distribution," and insert the words "distribution, except on a bona fide liquidation of the corporation," and a comma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, I ask that the committee amendment just stated be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Amend by adding a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the purpose of paying to ex-service men who are entitled to the sum of $60 additional compensation authorized under the provisions of section 1406 of an act to provide revenue, and for other purposes, approved February 24, 1919. Payments made from this appropriation shall be made in conformity with the provisions of the said section 1406.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if that is not the same amendment he offered during the day?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is the same amendment, except that I have raised the amount to $100,000. The original amendment provided for $50,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I want to say a word about it, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. This matter has been acted upon once to-day, except that the amount was different in the amendment heretofore offered. It is an amendment which would result in preventing the soldiers for a time from getting the pay which they otherwise would, as I explained in my remarks earlier in the day.

A deficiency appropriation bill will undoubtedly be passed in a short time, while this, even though it should be consented to in conference, would not become law until a long time after the deficiency bill is passed. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, while this subject has been acted upon once before to-day in a different amount, that is no precedent for its defeat at the present time.

At the suggestion of the acting chairman of the committee, the Senate has spent the last 20 or 30 minutes undoing something it did a few days ago. I have heard of little rumblings from the bond brokers and speculators since we adopted the amendment the other day in regard to the exemption of indebtedness incurred by the purchase of bonds. I have not, however, heard from any of the patriotic citizens who borrowed money for the purpose of purchasing the bonds during the war.

I offered this amendment because I think the Senate should act, and act hastily, to provide funds to make the payments to the soldiers who are entitled to them. We have not found any such delay as would probably result from defeating this amendment in regard to dealing with and providing for reorganizations of corporations. Only this afternoon the Senate adopted an amendment extending the advantages of the laws applicable to corporations in regard to taxation to corporations which were organized any time this year. It was not suggested that those corporations were not in existence and that that was retroactive, that it was the height of favoritism; but it seems to me that every time a suggestion is made in behalf of the soldiers of the country some technicality is raised or some excuse is given as to why we should not do anything for the soldiers.

It was upon a revenue bill that the amendment was adopted which allowed the soldier the $60 additional compensation. I introduced a bill, about the second day after the armistice was signed, to pay some little tribute to our soldiers as a token of the Nation's gratitude, and some few weeks later, when the revenue bill was pending, seeing no disposition on the part of those in control of the committees to do anything to assist our soldiers as they were being discharged, many of them penniless, I offered the amendment from which resulted the $60 additional pay which the soldiers were allowed, and it was attached to the revenue bill.

I have since felt that probably that was just the psychological moment to get even that little pittance for the American soldier, because since that time there has never been a disposition on the part of the majority to do anything whatever to assist the soldier. It has always been put off to a more convenient day. It is always a matter of excuses, and that "it will be the next in order."

Now, something like three years have elapsed—it is within a few days of three years—since the war ended, as far as actual hostilities were concerned, and our soldiers have received only the $60 pittance which was provided for in an amendment to a revenue bill, which was enacted in the early part of 1919.

It just happens, however, that all the soldiers have not received that $60. Some of them—who, for reasons I am not familiar with, did not receive this sum but have approved applications upon file—are now denied payment because the comptroller takes the position, as set out in a letter which I furnished this afternoon to go into the record that the appropriation has lapsed from which the payments were to be made. We have already passed a law providing the allowance, and it is only a question of making the appropriation. If Congress is going to be honorable and regard as sacredly its promises to the soldiers of the country as it does its promises to the money lenders and the investors in Government bonds, then certainly it will have to make the appropriation. So why delay? Why not make this appropriation now, place it upon this bill, and allow the men who are entitled to it to receive their pay without delay?

It is suggested that we will have the provision in a deficiency appropriation bill. It is highly probable that that will be under consideration for some time and that there will be some months' delay. Of course, it might be claimed that it would be sooner, but if it should happen to be enacted sooner than this bill shall become a law, then the two will not conflict in the least.

What I desire is to see something done whereby these loyal, patriotic boys who fought for their country and are entitled to this money shall be paid, and paid expeditiously, and I do not care to have any technicalities or excuses offered against this payment. I would not think of offering any.

There have been a good many changes made in this bill and changes made in the law. We have sought to change the law in many respects. We just inserted a provision in regard to the bonds. I think those who borrowed money to purchase bonds as a patriotic duty deserve every consideration on the part of the Government, but I do not think the speculators do, and I think even now you have left your amendment in such form, considering the other law, that the speculator in Government securities will have his entire interest deducted, even though he bought them at less than par and purchased them as a matter of speculation and was not the original purchaser.

Under the law you get interest deducted which you have paid upon investments. If the speculator gets any bonds, then his interest is deducted, and it is absolutely misleading to try to make it appear that this provision applies to the original purchaser of the bonds. You are going to exempt the interest paid by speculators in bonds.

Mr. President, if we are going to exempt interest as a deduction to speculators in bonds, we should write into this bill before it is enacted into law a provision requiring that the exemption shall not apply unless they pay par for the bonds. They are not entitled to it. They want to go around over this country speculating in bonds, driving down the price of bonds below par. They should not be shown that favoritism on the part of the Government.

So we should, in the interest of getting a good price for the bonds and upholding the value of our Government securities, make that provision apply only when they pay par for the bonds at the time of purchase, and that would have a tendency to stimulate the bond market.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, Congress appropriated the money to pay every soldier $60 a month. There was not a claim made by the soldier before the lapse of the appropriation to take the full amount, nor will there be claims made by the soldier to take what was appropriated by Congress, even though the amendment of the Senator be agreed to at this time.

But that is not the question. This is not an appropriation bill, and if the amendment were put upon this bill the bill would not, in my opinion, become a law as quickly as will the deficiency appropriation bill that is to be passed by the House in a very few days and come to the Senate. So anyone who is desirous of getting this money for the soldier quickly will vote against the amendment of the Senator from Florida and vote for a similar amendment on the deficiency appropriation bill. I will assure Senators that it is coming and will be passed without a question of doubt within a very few days after it comes from the House of Representatives.

Again, I wish to say, for the information of the Senate, that in the amendment which has just been agreed to there has been nothing provided which allows a speculator an exemption for the interest he paid upon the money that he used in the purchase of bonds. The amendment was limited to the original purchaser. The original purchaser paid to the Government of the United States dollar for dollar in the purchase of his bonds. If he purchased a thousand-dollar bond, the original purchaser of that bond paid $1,000 for it. No one is given an advantage; no one has been shown favoritism in the amendment that was just agreed to.

Of course, Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I know the amendment applies to the original purchaser, as the Senator said, but does not the law as applied to an interest indebtedness authorize one to exempt that upon which he is paying interest?

Mr. SMOOT. That was a 1918 law and was enacted in conformity with the official notice of the Treasury Department as to what the purchaser would receive in case he bought those low-interest bonds. Now this Congress is going to repeal that law, and after January 1, 1922, there will not be any exemption except for this year in the case of an original purchaser.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to offer now the third form of sales tax. As I spoke on October 11 in detail with reference to this particular amendment, I am going to ask that the amendment be received at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. What is the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. The 3 per cent manufacturers' sales tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the statement has been made by Senators on both sides of this Chamber that business men, and particularly manufacturers, do not understand my tax plan, that they are under the misapprehension that it relieves business, reduces the surtaxes, and affords a real reduction in the tax burden and a simplification in making out of a tax return.

I could introduce thousands of letters from business men showing that they do understand the business situation and the entire taxation problem better than has been evidenced in debate upon the floor of the Senate. For the information of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] I will read a message received from the Boston Chamber of Commerce, showing the chamber's attitude toward the principle of a sales tax:

> We wish to emphasize the fact that the Boston Chamber of Commerce by referendum voted 2,000 to 120 for legislation incorporating principles of sales tax; believe that such legislation would be simpler more equitable and more easily administered than present revenue law and would thus hasten return of business to normal. We believe this vote expresses sentiment of business men in this locality.
> (Signed) EVERETT MORSS,
> President Boston Chamber of Commerce.

I have in my files similar messages from many other associations. I have thousands of letters from business men, from professional men, and a few from workingmen and farmers' organizations, men in all walks of life and representing practically every State in the country. I have an enormous number of newspaper editorials showing a widespread understanding of my proposal and almost unanimous disapproval of the tax bill which the Senate is about to adopt. The people and the papers from one end of this land to the other understand my plan and understand the effect of the pending bill.

A solid Democratic vote, combined with the votes of certain Republicans, has already defeated two attempts made by me to give the American people and American business a real revision of our tax system. I have shaped those two proposals to meet the bill as previously acted upon by the Senate. Certain Senators on the Democratic side have characterized the one-half of 1 per cent turnover tax as worse than the 1 per cent manufacturers' tax.

When you vote against a sales tax on its merits, you defeat the only method of obtaining the revenue for the soldiers' bonus by taxation, or else you will have to later withdraw your opposition and approve a sales tax as a practical method of raising revenue.

I now offer the last chance for the Senate to determine the practicability of a sales tax, which some of those on the Democratic side describe as better than a turnover tax; I give Senators the opportunity to afford to American business, and so to American labor and to the American farmer, the relief which it is said business men understand my plan to present. I present a plan which will fulfill the pledges of both political parties. You may vote on this proposal, the original bill introduced by me, and hereafter maintain your silence except as you oblige yourselves to reply to the business man's and the workingman's inquiry, "What did you do?"

I therefore present the 3 per cent manufacturers' tax, the repeal of all the varieties of war taxes, the repeal of the excess-profits tax as of January 1, 1921, the retention of the corporation income tax at the flat rate of 10 per cent, and the surtax rates on individual incomes as originally agreed upon by the Finance Committee with the maximum rate of 32 per cent.

The effect of this amendment upon the bill in its present form should at least satisfy the objection of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], since the capital stock tax will be retained, bringing in $75,000,000, the elimination of the $2,000 exemption for corporations will mean $30,000,000 more, and the increase in the tax on alcoholic liquors will bring $30,000,000 additional, so there will be at least $135,000,000 increased revenue for 1923, over the estimates set forth in my speech of October 11.

The Treasury Department expert has estimated that a 1 per cent turnover tax on goods, wares, and merchandise will bring in $900,000,000 a year. Then a 3 per cent turnover tax would mean $2,700,000,000 a year. I estimate the 3 per cent manufacturers and producers' tax to yield $759,000,000 a year, and as that estimate includes production and importations as well as manufactured articles I believe the estimate to be most conservative in view of the expert's estimate as to the yield of a turnover tax at one-third the rate of the tax proposed by me.

The tax bill as now before the Senate is not a revision such as the American people have a right to expect from the pledges of both political parties and the campaign speeches of presidential and congressional candidates for office. The pending bill merely involves administrative changes, a reduction in the higher surtaxes, the repeal of the transportation taxes, certain excise taxes, and the excess-profits tax.

The bill gives no relief for business, outside of the transportation tax repeal and some slight exceptions, until 1923. In the year 1923, 100,000 corporations will have their taxes reduced by reason of the excess-profits tax repeal. In the year 1923 over 100,000 other corporations will have their taxes increased through the imposition of a 15 per cent tax instead of 10 per cent, or a 50 per cent increase in their taxes.

Not until that year 1923, and then only slightly, will the capital of individual investors be relieved for investment in productive enterprises giving employment to the unemployed by the reduction in the higher surtaxes. And let me say right here, that the sole reason why the Committee on Finance recommended the maximum surtax rate at 32 per cent was in order to induce wealthy investors to put their money in productive enterprises instead of in tax-exempt securities, thereby encouraging industrial development and affording employment for more people. That purpose has been nullified by accepting the bloc amendment fixing the highest surtax at 50 per cent.

So far as accomplishing the purpose of the committee is concerned, the highest rate may as well be 65 per cent as under the present law, as 50 per cent. I desire to remind Senators that the 50 per cent maximum will not accomplish the desired purpose. It is purely a compromise in rates. It means a reduction in taxation for the very wealthy, but the full responsibility for relieving wealth must rest upon the Senate as a whole, since the Senate as a whole has adopted that 50 per cent maximum.

I wish to remind Senators, also, that the proposal to repeal the excess-profits tax first came from the Democratic administration, which found that tax to be inequitable, unscientific, and unworkable.

The first proposal to repeal all the transportation taxes came, I believe, in my original bill, but the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] made a similar proposal shortly afterward. My original bill also proposed the repeal of all other miscellaneous forms of taxation.

I am just reminding the Senators that every repeal in the present bill came from this side of the Chamber, as my original proposal was all inclusive.

Considerable has been said in this Chamber about making the bonus bill a matter of politics. I want to say right now that this tax bill has been too much considered from the standpoint of politics, rather than with a view to carrying out the pledges of both political parties and of giving the American people a real revision of our tax system for peace times through the repeal of all forms of war taxation.

I have conscientiously attempted to provide such a revision as I believe the American people expect this Congress to enact. I have no pride of authorship in my proposal. I have approached the tax problem in an entirely nonpartisan way, but purely as a business problem from the standpoint of both the administration and the public.

Not a single practical and constructive proposal has been advanced from the Democratic side of the Chamber to relieve the present situation by the enactment of a proper revision of our tax system for peace times.

I believe and I charge that the solid Democratic opposition to my proposal is actuated from the viewpoint of politics and not from that of the best interests of the American people.

My proposal would mean a real revision of our tax laws, a relief for business, a release of capital for investment in productive enterprises, giving more employment and increased prosperity for the farmers, since they can prosper only as the consumers whom they serve can prosper.

I desire to make no further comments on the proposal, as I went into the matter at great length on October 11. I am satisfied merely to put the matter to a vote. The entire responsibility for not giving the American people a real revision and simplification of our tax system for peace times, for not carrying out the pledges contained in the platforms of both political parties, may now rest upon the vote as recorded in the Senate proceedings.

My duty would not be fully performed unless I presented the exact plan which has received such widespread indorsement, and I therefore ask for a vote on this bill. I shall not ask for the yeas and nays. We have had two yea-and-nay votes on the sales-tax plan, and I shall be content with a viva voce vote of the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a situation which has developed somewhat recently by reason of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is also pertinent to a provision of the revenue bill which the Finance Committee has offered as an amendment and which has been adopted by the Senate.

If Senators will bear with me, I desire to call their attention to a matter which has been made somewhat prominent recently by a decision of the Supreme Court. Heretofore there has been a provision of law permitting a taxpayer who has paid internal revenue taxes under protest to bring suit against the collector who collected the taxes from him. In such case if the district court of the United States should give a certificate of reasonable cause judgment in that case became a judgment against the United States and was payable without further appropriation by Congress. Recently the Supreme Court has held that if the collector who collected the money has died his successor could not be sued and that in such case the claimant could only recover by bringing suit in the Court of Claims. If he does that he can not recover any interest on the money during the time which the Government has held it.

There has been put into this bill a provision for the payment of interest by the United States in case of a refund. That clause will be found on page 276 of the bill, where it is provided:

> That upon the allowance of a claim for the refund of or credit for taxes paid interest shall be allowed and paid upon the total amount of such refund.

That provision has been adopted by the Senate. Therefore, clearly it is the view of the Senate that in case of the unlawful collection of an internal-revenue tax it shall be refunded with interest. That is the provision we have put in, but that covers only the case where the refund is made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or through the machinery provided for such refund. It leaves this situation: If a taxpayer had paid such a tax and he is entitled to a refund he may bring suit in the United States district court against the collector to whom he paid it and recover that sum with interest; but if the collector to whom he paid it goes out of office or dies, then he can not sue the successor of that individual collector, and, of course, can not recover any interest. If he goes into the Court of Claims, he can not recover any interest, and he can not sue the United States in the district court if the claim amounts to more than $10,000.

What is here proposed is that we shall remedy that situation by providing that where the collector to whom the revenue was paid has died then the claimant may sue the United States. It simply brings about an equitable situation and prevents the taxpayer from having to suffer the hardships which would be brought upon him simply through the accident of the death of the collector to whom he paid the money. I offer the amendment for the purpose of remedying that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator both amendments there?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I think I shall offer the second prepared amendment first. I may say that these amendments have been prepared by the expert draftsmen in connection with the Attorney General's office, and are arranged so as to meet the situation and do justice to the various taxpayers of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendments. I have the amendments here, and I was going to offer them myself in just a moment; but the Senator from New Mexico may offer both amendments, if he wishes to, and I hope the Senate will adopt them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 261, after line 16, it is proposed to insert the following new subdivision:

(c) Paragraph 20 of section 24 of the Judicial Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Concurrent with the Court of Claims, of any suit or proceeding, commenced after the passage of the revenue act of 1921, for the recovery of any internal-revenue tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty claimed to have been collected without authority or any sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected under the internal-revenue laws, even if the claim exceeds $10,000, if the collector of internal revenue by whom such tax, penalty, or such was collected is dead at the time such suit or proceeding is commenced."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amendment just agreed to is very simple. The other amendments are amendments to section 1324 of the pending bill on page 276. That section requires some clerical amendments. Really the amendments I desire to propose are merely designed to adjust the section.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will send the amendments up, I I shall follow them as they are being read.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There are several amendments combined in one, but they all carry out the purposes designed.

First, however, it will be necessary to reconsider the vote by which section 1324 was adopted. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which that amendment was adopted may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was adopted will be reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Now, to that section I offer the amendments which I send to the desk and which I ask may be adopted en bloc.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the Senator from New Mexico will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 276, in the heading on line 16, after the word "Refunds," it is proposed to insert "and judgments"; on page 276, line 17, before the word "That," to insert "(a)"; on page 277, after line 16, to insert:

(b) Section 177 of the Judicial Code is amended to read as follows:

"No interest shall be allowed on any claim up to the time of the rendition of judgment by the Court of Claims, unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest, except that interest may be allowed in any judgment of any court rendered after the passage of the revenue act of 1921 against the United States for any internal revenue tax erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or for any penalty collected without authority or any sum which was excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected, under the internal revenue laws.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have another amendment to offer. On page 8, line 8, I move to insert a new subdivision to read as follows:

(c) A stock dividend shall not be subject to tax, but if after the distribution of any such dividend the corporation proceeds to cancel or redeem its stock at such time and in such manner as to make the distribution and cancellation or redemption essentially equivalent to the distribution of a taxable dividend the amount received in redemption or cancellation of the stock shall be treated as a taxable dividend to the extent of the earnings or profits accumulated by such corporation after February 28, 1913.

Mr. President, nothing has developed at the present time to necessitate this proposed amendment, but conditions are ripening, I think, among a number of corporations for them to declare stock dividends which, under the late decision of the Supreme Court, would not be taxable, and then, we will say in a month or a short time thereafter, to redeem the stock, in other words, cancel the stock. In that way, under the law as it now stands, and under the Supreme Court decision, a stockholder would not be compelled to pay a tax upon the income so derived. The amendment is for the purpose of preventing the provision relating to the exemption of stock dividends from being used for a fraudulent purpose where the dividend is simply declared and then the stock taken up or traded back again in some way so that the stockholder will be free from the tax. I think it is a proper amendment to be adopted.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment comes in on page 8 after line 8 as subdivision (c).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LENROOT. Do I understand a reservation was made of the committee amendment, being subdivision (b) on page 79, lines 6 and 7?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was no reservation made of that amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to reserve that amendment in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when the bill was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, I reserved a separate vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the purpose of which was to exempt holding companies from the corporate-stock tax to the extent that the stock held by them and subsidiary companies had been taxed. In order to bring the matter before the Senate, I move to strike out the amendment agreed to as in the Committee of the Whole in the following words:

But if the taxpayer owns at least a majority of the voting stock and at least a majority of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock of any other domestic corporation liable to the tax imposed by this section, the fair average value for the preceding year ending June 30 of the stock so owned by the taxpayer shall be deducted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before that amendment is taken up, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry: Ought we not first to concur in the amendments which have not been reserved?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that that would be a better procedure to follow.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill is in the Senate and open to general amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. And the statement was repeatedly made by the Vice President that it was not necessary to make any reservations?

Mr. LODGE. After we get into the Senate. I am merely speaking of the method of procedure that amendments not reserved to which there is no objection are usually agreed to en bloc. That does not interfere with reserving any amendment. Senators may reserve any amendment they desire to reserve.

Mr. REED. I know of no particular reason why that procedure should not be followed.

Mr. LODGE. That has been the procedure universally followed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us dispose of those amendments to which there is no objection, and then the Senator from Missouri may offer any amendment he desires.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to concur en bloc in all amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, except those as to which reservations have been made? The Secretary will state those amendments which have been reserved.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to reserve a vote on paragraph 22, page 201.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The following reservations have been specifically made:

By Mr. LENROOT the amendment on page 115, subdivision (f).

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I will not press that reservation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his reservation of the amendment referred to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. By Mr. LA FOLLETTE, on page 125, under the heading of "Returns to be public records."

By Mr. REED, on page 212, inserting, after line 12, under the heading "Special taxes," the amendment relative to holding companies.

By Mr. REED, on page 198, line 6, whereby the committee amendment was agreed to, striking out the tax on chewing gum.

By Mr. POMERENE, on page 212, inserting in the amendment an excise tax on incomes exceeding $3,000,000.

By Mr. EDGE, on page 201, lines 15 to 22, perfumes, petroleum jellies, and so forth.

By Mr. LENROOT, on page 79, lines 6 and 7.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND, on page 201, paragraph 22.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the same one to which I have just referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any others?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I reserve the amendment that was lost by one vote on page 153.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment that is offered and lost does not have to be reserved.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in all other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments not reserved were concurred in.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I asked for a separate vote upon this proposition, because the vote was exceedingly close, and I hoped that on reflection we might obtain a different result.

In plain, simple English the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which was adopted, and which I am now moving to strike out, provides that holding companies shall be exempted from the corporate stock tax upon their corporate stock to the extent of the taxes paid upon the stock held by them of their subsidiaries.

This excise tax is based upon the theory that the Government is taxing a corporation for the privilege of doing business as a corporation, and accordingly a rate of taxation has been fixed so that the corporation pays $1 of taxes for each 1,000 of its capital stock. The tax is exceedingly light upon the small corporation, of course.

When we come to consider the great corporations which are organized for the purpose of promoting trust transactions, and which constitute the greatest menace there is to-day to the industrial world and to the whole economic situation, it is proposed that in the case of these holding companies, organized for the purpose of moving in unison the tremendous power of a dozen or perhaps a hundred corporations—for it could be extended that far, and in one or two instances has been extended nearly that far—the corporate right to wield, under the direction of a single mind, all of the corporate power of the aggregation shall be exempted from taxation to the extent that taxes are paid on the stock of the subsidiaries.

It is entirely conceivable that a corporation might be organized with a capital stock of a billion dollars, that the stock of the subsidiary companies might amount to a billion dollars, and it might all be held by the holding company; but the holding company exercises the exceedingly valuable and sometimes dangerous privilege of uniting the forces of all the subsidiary companies in one management, and for that privilege—which is the highest corporate privilege that can be exercised, and the most dangerous—it is proposed to exempt it from taxation.

Mr. President, I do not intend to argue that proposition at length. I want to say that if there is any company in the world that ought to pay a high corporate-stock tax it is the company that produces nothing, that creates nothing, that simply unites small competitive concerns and destroys competition, and then has the privilege of exercising a tremendous, concentrated power in the control of the business of the people of the United States. So, Mr. President, I have asked for a separate vote, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this amendment, which I offered and which was adopted, was simply for the purpose of relieving the injustice of double and triple taxation which undoubtedly and admittedly exists. Putting in this amendment has nothing to do with the power of a holding company; they would have power just the same, but it cures the evil, and, as I say, the injustice of this double taxation.

What I had in mind particularly were the railroads and the public utilities—I mean the street railways—which represent very large interests and which are heavily burdened now both by State and by National laws, which, as everyone knows, are not making great amounts of money, and upon which this double and sometimes multiple taxation falls with very great severity.

It is to them that the relief will come; but striking out my amendment will have no effect whatever on the existing control by the parent company or the holding company of railroads or public utilities or any other form of company.

Double taxation is not favored in any of the States that I know of, or in any system of taxation. I think it extremely unjust that it should be put on in this case, and I always thought so, at the time the bill was framed with the original construction of which I had something to do.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate, but I think it is an injustice that ought to be remedied, and a relief that might well be given to the railroads and the public utilities, who suffer most, by far the most, from this double taxation.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, the corporation is necessary to the transaction of the immense business of to-day. It is a part of modern civilization. It is like a great engine; it is like the elements of fire and water, absolutely essential, dangerous when abused, by virtue of its enormous power. I am not here to inveigh against the corporation because I am inclined to call the attention of the country at times to abuses of its power.

There is as much to be said in favor of the stock corporation as against it, perhaps, or more; but there is little that can be said in favor of the holding company pure and simple. It differs from the corporation. The corporation is a fiscal institution, established, and here to stay. The holding company is in most cases merely a device. It was conceived in iniquity and born in sin. The charters of a great number of holding companies, their very operations, have been declared an offense akin to a crime. The creation of the Northern Securities Co. was an offense before a single train was ever moved. The organization of the Standard Oil Co., the organization of the United States Steel Corporation, was in its very incubation literally begotten in sin. The purpose was to evade the provisions of the Sherman Act.

Here are 15 or 20 independent concerns. They can not agree to limit output or to fix prices or to limit purchases or to sell on a scale without violating the law; so they simply put all their securities in a hotch-potch, put them into the coffers of a great holding company, and take, in lieu of these securities which are the basis of the holding company's property, certificates of ownership, and this corporate entity controls the output, fixes prices, and does for a thousand corporations all the things which, if they had attempted to do without the device, would have been in violation of the law.

The Sherman Act received a death blow and any effort to prevent combinations in restraint of trade has been paralyzed more successfully by the organization and institution of the holding company than by any other device. There may be instances in which the holding company is necessary; there may be instances in which its operation is beneficent; but on the whole it is an institution that was designed, beginning in the brain of Victor Morawetz and other great lawyers, for no other purpose than to evade the law and to hothouse and incubate monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade.

I view with regret and with alarm the institution of commissions to control every kind of business, to turn over to the Federal Government a great power of granting plenary indulgence to men to form combinations and to violate the law. I am in favor of a return to the Constitution. I am in favor of allowing business, great organizations, no matter how large or rich or powerful, to attend to their own business so long as they keep within the law; but you will never restore that individuality, that independence of action, that individual initiative, to great businesses until you have restrained the operation of the holding company, and to exempt this thing from taxation is, to my mind, not only unwise but unspeakably iniquitous.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I voted against the Lodge amendment because it occurred to me that we should not change the law in that respect at this time. I recognized that in some cases we would have double taxation; in other cases just taxation would be evaded. But when the amendment was agreed to I felt that it was my duty, for the purpose of making provision for the taxes which would be lost, to vote for the increased corporation tax of $1 on all corporations having a capital stock in excess of $3,000,000.

I do not think both of those amendments ought to prevail. Indeed, my own judgment is that neither of them should be enacted into law, but we ought to leave the law as to the taxation of holding companies as it is now, the same as we should leave the tax of $1 per thousand on corporations with capital in excess of $3,000,000.

As I remember, we will lose $20,000,000 through this amendment and we will make $20,000,000 by the other amendment. I think that if we could leave the law as it is in these respects we would be doing the wise thing under the circumstances. Therefore I shall not hesitate to vote to reconsider this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and I hope that then a motion will be made to repeal the provisions by which we increased capital-stock tax.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that the increase in the capital-stock tax on corporations owning assets in excess of $3,000,000 was made upon my motion, and I made that motion because of the necessity of making up the revenue lost by the adoption of the amendment now again pending. I agree with the Senator in his argument, and if this amendment is rejected I shall ask that the amendment increasing the capital-stock tax shall also be rejected, leaving the law as it now stands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is my desire, and that is the reason why I rose at this time to make this statement.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the question with regard to the tax on the holding company is so interwoven with the increased franchise tax on certain corporations, it may perhaps be well for me to say now what I intended to say on that subject.

I have asked to have reserved the vote on the amendment presented by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], whereby the franchise tax upon all corporations having assets in excess of $3,000,000 should be doubled. If that amendment shall prevail, we will have this anomalous situation: The tax on corporations with assets of less than $3,000,000 is fixed at $1 per $1,000; the tax on all corporations having assets in excess of $3,000,000 is made $2 per $1,000.

The result is that if I have $1,000 in a corporation with assets amounting to less than $3,000,000 the assets represented by that $1,000 of capital stock are chargeable with a $1 tax.

On the other hand, if my friend the Senator from Missouri has $1,000 of the capital stock of a corporation having assets in excess of $3,000,000, and his stock is worth $1,000, the same as mine, his corporation is taxed at the rate of $2 per $1,000.

If it were possible that all the large corporations were profiteering corporations or corporations which have excessive incomes, then there might be some excuse for that, but as a rule it is the corporation of large capitalization and of small earning power which will be penalized by this amendment. I think it is wholly unfair, and for that reason I reserved the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] for a special vote.

I hope the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts may be defeated, and that upon a revote the other amendment may be defeated.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood that it was the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts which we were to vote upon.

Mr. REED. I have moved to strike that amendment out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending question.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The motion of the Senator from Missouri is as follows:

> I move to amend the amendment inserted on page 212, after line 12, by striking therefrom the following words:

Then follow the words of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. REED'S motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to take a moment, in fairness to all Members of the Senate, again to call attention to the unanimous-consent agreement and to make the suggestion that a mere request to reserve for another vote in the Senate any question which has been agreed to or defeated in the Committee of the Whole would not, under the unanimous-consent agreement, bring the matter up for a further debate, giving a further 10 minutes to a Senator. That did not apply to the matter before the Senate just now, for the reason that the debates upon that were had before we entered into the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think that admonition will apply to me.

I move to amend the amendment inserted on page 212, after line 12, by striking therefrom the following words: "and not in excess of $3,000,000, and $2 for each $1,000 of such value in excess of $3,000,000."

Mr. President, I stated a moment ago what the purpose of the amendment would be when offered. I do not intend to repeat what I then said. I think with all due respect that the present legislation, so far as it relates to corporations, is subject to this criticism. It increases by 50 per cent the tax on corporations and particularly those of lower earning power. It is true that it applies to all, but it cuts all the excess-profits taxes so that all corporations earning 15 per cent or more are benefited by the pending bill; and now, to add insult to injury almost, there is an attempt to double the taxes on the stock of those corporations with assets in excess of $3,000,000, and that embraces the most of the corporations of lower earning capacity. I think I need not say more.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, this amendment was adopted after the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was adopted exempting the holding company from taxation on the value of the capital stock of their subsidiary corporations. When I offered that amendment I will say very frankly that I did it because I believed the increase of the capital stock tax would really affect those holding companies and make them pay a greater measure of what they ought to pay, in my judgment, than they would pay under the amendment that has just been adopted. Inasmuch now as this amendment has been defeated by the Senate, I am quite willing that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio shall also be rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin. I think whether the Pomerene amendment is adopted or the provision remains as the Senate has voted it in the bill, the increase in the capital-stock tax on corporations made by a solemn vote of the Senate ought not to be rescinded. I do not know to what extent the adoption of the Lodge amendment may have influenced some Senators to vote for the capital-stock tax amendment, but I do believe, independently of the Lodge amendment and assuming that the capital-stock tax amounted to $75,000,000, that the amount of taxes which will hereafter, under the provisions of the bill, be paid by the corporations of the country is out of proportion to the taxes that will be paid by partnerships and individuals.

I do not wish to go over the argument which I have presented heretofore once or twice. I have tried to show and I think I have successfully shown to the Senate heretofore that the taxes which we impose upon corporations in the pending bill are only about one-half of those which we impose upon individuals and less than two-thirds of those which we impose upon partnerships.

We had a tax against the capital stock of corporations heretofore that raised $75,000,000 revenue. That tax has been retained, and by reason of this increase in the tax upon the capital stock of corporations whose income exceeds $3,000,000 we have added about $20,000,000, so that the capital-stock tax of corporations will hereafter be, if this amendment is retained in the bill, $95,000,000 as against $75,000,000 heretofore. Therefore, we will have added by this amendment only $20,000,000 to the taxes upon corporations. We added $30,000,000 more to the taxes upon corporations when we repealed the exemption allowed corporations whose income was in excess of $25,000. That makes $50,000,000. Then we added a 5 per cent tax upon the income of corporations, which amounted to $267,000,000. That makes $317,000,000 that we have added to corporations.

But we have taken off of the corporations about $450,000,000, so that we have relieved the corporations of more than $130,000,000 of taxes. Under existing law with the low excess profits that are now being made and upon which taxes are being paid, the corporations of the country would pay very much less taxes than the individuals or even the copartnerships. Under these circumstances I do not think we ought to be taking any more taxes off of the corporations of the country.

This tax is not a hardship upon the corporations. It is only a tax of $1 per $1,000 of stock value upon corporations whose income is less than $3,000,000 and only $2 per $1,000 of stock value upon those whose income is in excess of $3,000,000. Can anybody say that $2 upon each $1,000 worth of stock is an excessive tax for a great corporation like the Steel Trust, enjoying one of the most valuable privileges that was ever conferred upon an organization or citizen?

This is not a tax upon property. It is a tax for the privilege of doing business. If $1 per $1,000 of stock value upon the small corporations for the privilege of doing the small business in which they are engaged is a fair tax, I maintain that $2 per $1,000 of capital stock value upon a corporation like the great Steel Corporation, a giant holding company with scores of subsidiaries, is not an unreasonable sum for the great privilege and franchise granted it by the Government.

Mr. President, as long as an individual is paying 38 per cent upon his income, while a corporation earning the same amount of money is paying less than 20 per cent, while a copartnership with the same amount of capital and making the same earnings is paying 34 and 35 per cent, I can not believe that a corporation which is taxed only about 18 per cent ought to be further exempted from taxation.

So far from reducing the taxes of corporations in this condition of affairs, I think we ought to increase them. I desire to say now that from the beginning of the discussion up to the present time the one fundamental thing that I have insisted upon, in season and out of season, has been that whatever tax we might levy should be levied with approximate equality as among the three great groups of taxpayers in this country, namely, individuals, copartnerships, and corporations.

No one in the Senate will dare to say, in the light of the facts that have been presented here, the figures that have been furnished us by the actuary of the Treasury, that corporations will pay under this bill anything like their share of the taxes of the country. Will anybody say that the corporations of the country are earning less money than the partnerships and individuals? Will anybody say that these great corporations are less able to pay these taxes than partnerships and individuals who are engaged in business in the country?

Now, unless it can be shown that these figures are incorrect, that the corporations are paying their equal share, then that class of institutions which are doing over one-half of the business of the country will have been unjustly relieved of their fair share of taxation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I regret that an effort should be made to take out of the bill this particular clause. In a word, it is proposed that when a corporation has $3,000,000 of capital stock value it shall pay $2 on each $1,000 of stock value above $3,000,000. Below that sum it pays $1, and below that sum every other corporation pays $1 per $1,000 of stock value. Now let us see if there is any injustice in it as a matter of principle.

We tax the individual a larger percentage as his income increases. He is the same man and enjoys the same privileges, but as his income increases as the value of his estate increases, we increase the tax as to the rate as well as the amount. We levy a cumulative or increasing tax upon the estates of individuals. The small estate bears a small percentage, the large estate bears a large percentage; and when we come to this tax and propose to levy a higher corporation stock tax upon the big corporation than we do upon the small corporation we are simply admitting the same principle we have applied to the individual living and to the individual dead.

But, Mr. President, there is another consideration. The right to organize and maintain a very large corporation carries with it certain advantages that the smaller corporation does not enjoy. It is because there are advantages attaching to the mere massing of wealth that wealth is massed in these great corporations. One of the advantages is that the business is so disseminated and scattered that a loss in any particular place may not destroy the business, because it can be made up from gains in other places. Hence an investment in a large corporation, such as the Steel Corporation, is much less likely to become a total loss than an investment in the small corporation, which may be broken down by some catastrophe, local in its character, and short in its duration. Therefore the privilege of having a great corporation with an enormous capital is a privilege that carries with it a special and particular value.

We have been told from the inception of this debate, as an excuse for not imposing an excess-profits tax, that the excess-profits tax will not be collected from the very great concerns, because they have so swollen their capital that when the profits are divided on that enormous capital the rate of profit disappears and that therefore the excess-profits tax does not reach them.

Now, when it is proposed to levy a pitiable increase of an additional dollar upon a thousand dollars of stock so that we will get a little money from these concerns that have overcapitalized themselves for the very purpose of escaping taxation, or of swindling the public, we find Senators here, with tears in their eyes, ready to appeal for them. If this tax of $2 on those corporations be repealed, it will put into the Steel Trust coffers over a million dollars a year; it will put into the Standard Oil group considerably more than a million dollars a year; it will put an enormous sum into the tobacco companies; it will benefit every great corporation in this country that is overcapitalized. The amendment which I propose is the only way we can reach them as matters now stand.

Senators talk about the railroads, and claim that this proposition will hurt the railroads. Mr. President, if it did impose a little additional tax on the railroads, they would in turn put it on the public in their rates. I would be willing to accept an amendment which would provide that in case the earnings of any corporation are regulated and limited by law it should be exempted from this extra dollar of tax; but, so far as I am concerned, while I recognize the fact that the railroads just at this present moment, because of the experience through which they have been going, may be hard pressed for money, I have not yet reached the conclusion that we must make them the special beneficiaries of unusual care by the Government.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to call the Senator's attention on this point to the fact that we have already eliminated the transportation tax, and the railroads can very well afford to pay this proposed tax.

Mr. REED. Yes; we have taken off the transportation tax of $280,000,000 a year, and this tax will not harm them.

The cold proposition that we are to vote on here is whether we shall levy a tax that in a small and almost infinitesimal degree will reach the overcapitalized and tremendously big corporations of this country. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has repeatedly said upon this floor, and no Senator has dared challenge his statement, that this bill proposes to levy taxes upon corporations lighter than the taxes upon individuals. Every attempt that we make to put a tax upon a corporation is resisted by a solid block of votes. I impugn no man's motive, but I desire to say that if the directors of the Steel Trust and of the Standard Oil Co. had sat on the other side of this Chamber, they would have voted in nearly every instance the same way that gentlemen over there have voted. Mr. President, this tax ought to be retained, though Senators on the other side of the Chamber may take it off; they have the power to take it off.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in every measure which I have presented here in connection with this bill, I have suggested that in taxing corporations we should not lose sight of the fact that corporations are aggregations of stockholders. I have sought in every conceivable way to equalize the taxes between individuals and partnerships and the stockholders of corporations. I proposed an amendment which would relieve corporations of any income tax at all, the theory being that the corporation was a mere aggregation of stockholders and, if its net income was all distributed to its stockholders, the stockholders then should be treated precisely the same as individuals and partners deriving income from any other source. The theory on which I did that was that whenever we levy any tax upon a corporation as such we are losing sight of the principle of equality among taxpayers. If we can raise the revenue easily without taxing the corporation at all, with a certain minor exception, to which I will refer and have always referred, we should not tax the corporation, because in the corporation, and especially the large corporations, there are thousands of stockholders who have no income but that which they receive from small holdings in the corporation, and any tax upon the corporation is a tax upon those small stockholders.

We specially exempt any individual who has an income of less than $2,000 a year and who has a family from the payment of any income tax. The Senate has decided not to levy an excess-profits tax; it has decided not to levy a tax upon the undistributed income of corporations, but has decided to levy a flat tax upon all net income of all corporations. The effect of that is, in my judgment, to increase by 50 per cent the tax on all corporations in this country which are earning only a modest return upon their invested capital, and it is that class of corporations on which we are proposing to put this additional capital-stock tax.

Take the railroads of the country to-day. They are earning less than 8 per cent upon their invested capital. We have by the provisions of this bill increased the taxes on those corporations by 50 per cent. Take the Steel Corporation to which my friend from Missouri has referred. Despite present business conditions under this bill we increase its tax by 50 per cent over and above what it would pay except for the provisions of this bill. It is my humble judgment that we have increased the taxes now on the big corporations more than we should. We have increased them by 50 per cent, and when we increase the tax upon the net income of the railroads of the country we are levying an additional tax upon transportation. The same situation exists as to the other large corporations; with the provisions of this bill as it is now we are increasing their taxes by 50 per cent. I think that is wrong; I do not believe that it can be justified.

But I have taken the position that the large corporations perhaps might pay some revenue because of their size. They have some advantage in business; they are put in a position to wield greater power upon the business interests of the country, and for that reason I was willing to vote in favor of the amendment to put an additional tax upon the capital stock of the large corporations; but I did so upon the theory that that should be the only tax levied upon corporations because they were corporations; but now, the provisions of the bill, as the Senate has adopted it thus far, have increased the taxes of the corporations by 50 per cent, and in these times of adversity I think that is more than enough.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, does the Senator think that when the Republican majority took the excess-profits tax off they did not do anything for the corporations?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think, Mr. President, they did not do anything for the large corporations.

Mr. REED. Why, Mr. President, they paid excess profits taxes only last year.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; that is true; but——

Mr. REED. And they have the power to make excess profits to-morrow because they can put their prices up any time they want to do so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They have the power to make excess profits, but they are not making excess profits. If there were an excess-profits tax applied to these corporations, I know it would be far better than what has been done.

I think it is an indefensible position to take off the excess-profits tax and levy this flat tax of 15 per cent in lieu of it; to take off the tax on the excess profits of those concerns that are making high profits and put it upon those that are making less than a reasonable profit. I say that it is indefensible, but it has been done, and you have raised the tax already by 50 per cent upon these corporations. I do not believe that can be justified; and this additional capital-stock tax is simply augmenting this gross, and I feel like saying infamous, thing that the Senate has already done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that when we have, according to our estimates, levied taxes upon corporations which will yield $100,000,000 less than it was estimated the taxes in the present law would yield, we have increased the taxes of corporations 50 per cent instead of reducing them?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I stated in the beginning that I looked upon corporations as an aggregation of stockholders. The Senator from North Carolina apparently does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New Mexico has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico in my time—if I may surrender my time to him for the purpose of answering it—if he will explain a little further the question just suggested by the Senator from North Carolina?

Having answered that, I should like to ask the Senator whether there is any fixed relation between capital stock and profits and if the attitude of the Senator from Missouri did not assume a fixed relation between the amount of the capital stock and the profits; that is to say, if there was a large corporation, necessarily the profits would be larger than those of a small corporation, and he attempted to put corporations in the same category as individuals. I want to ask whether the Senator thinks the position of the Senator from Missouri was correct?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad the Senator from Utah has asked the question and will permit me to answer it in his time.

I do not believe that the tax laws of this country relating to corporations should be founded upon the principle suggested by the Senator from North Carolina. It is not right that we should simply say that here are a lot of corporations in the country, and we want them to pay so much tax, and here are the individuals of the country, and we want them to pay so much tax, and because we do not raise this amount of tax from the corporations we are therefore doing something that we ought not to do.

If Senators will listen for just a moment, there are corporations and corporations. Take the large corporations of this country: They are owned by thousands and in many cases more than a hundred thousand stockholders. It may be that those stockholders have put into a corporation of that kind dollar for dollar of every share of stock that has been issued. The investment is there, and if they are earning only a modest income upon that invested capital they should be treated as modest individual income taxpayers. You can not justify the taxation of a corporation merely because of its size, except in a small degree. You must not forget the hundreds of thousands of individual stockholders there. That is why I have always insisted that the income of a corporation which is not distributed should be taxed, because there is no other way of getting at it, because they keep the undistributed dividends there for the purpose of evading taxation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point of order is to ascertain who is speaking—whether it is the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] whose time is now being counted or whether it is that of the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I was answering a question of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have the floor, and I yielded to the Senator from New Mexico to answer two questions which I propounded.

Mr. McCUMBER. I raise the point of order that the Senator can not parcel out time in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. A Senator can not farm out the time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not think the time is being parceled out, Mr. President. The Senator from Utah asked me to explain certain matters, and that I have been attempting to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, that can not be done.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington will state it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the question.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In an amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, on page 212, after line 12, it is proposed to strike out these words:

and not in excess of $3,000,000, and $2 for each $1,000 of such value in excess of $3,000,000.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Are we voting now upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to strike out that amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How can we strike it out before it is in?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in. It was put in as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As in Committee of the Whole, but it is not adopted in the Senate until it is voted upon in the Senate. We have already adopted en bloc the amendments upon which a separate vote was not reserved. A separate vote was reserved upon this amendment. We have not taken a vote upon the amendment. It has not been adopted in the Senate. It is not in the bill in the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. This amendment was an amendment to an amendment which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole, and the only way in which it can be gotten out is by this motion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the situation then stands that the motion is made to strike out, and a vote in the affirmative would put us back in the position of the $1 tax. A vote in the negative will let the bill stand at $2.

Let us be sure that we have that correctly. I am making an inquiry of the Chair. As I understand, a vote in the affirmative will allow the tax to stand at $1 below $3,000,000 and $2 above. Is the motion made in the affirmative or in the negative form? That is what I can not understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is made in the affirmative, to strike out certain words that were inserted on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin. Senators in favor of the motion will vote "yea"; those opposed will vote "nay." The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SWANSON (when the name of Mr. GLASS was called). My colleague [Mr. GLASS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Transferring my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD], I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], I am at liberty to vote on this question. I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent. I am unable to secure a transfer, and I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, and being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PENROSE. Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE. A few moments ago I transferred my general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD]. I am informed that the junior Senator from Oklahoma is already covered, so I will make my transfer to the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GERRY. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and that if present the Senator from Nebraska would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 24—as follows:

So the amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless there are further amendments at this time, the question is on concurring in the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. REED. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, which was reserved for a separate vote, although I believe that it was unnecessary in this instance to have reserved it.

Let me say to the Clerk, unless there is some change in the print he has, that the amendment will come properly on page 131, after line 3. The misleading feature is that the excess-profits tax is continued under the preceding portion of the bill to January 1, 1921. I do not change that, but the clause I now propose to insert at the end of the provision for 1921 covers 1922 and succeeding years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 131, after line 3, insert the following:

For the calendar year 1922 and for each calendar year thereafter excess-profits taxes shall be levied as follows: Twenty per cent of the net income in excess of 50 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that brings up a question on which we once voted, but as to which I hoped there would be enough votes changed, on reflection, so that we could keep an excess-profits tax where the profits were above 50 per cent.

This would make the law so generous that even a profiteer should not object to it. Under this amendment a corporation could make a clear profit, over and above all expenses of every character, of 50 per cent before it would have to pay any tax whatsoever, except the flat tax of 15 per cent. When it had made 50 per cent then it would begin paying an excess-profits tax.

Appeals have been made for the small corporation. It has been said that the small corporation is the corporation that makes the large profits; but certainly when you allow the small corporation 50 per cent net before you apply any additional taxes and then only take $1 out of $5 of what they make above the 50 per cent nobody ought to shed any tears over that sort of a tax.

Mr. President, I insist again—and I merely state it to call it to the attention of the Senate—that the great trouble with the country to-day is the profiteer. Farm products have gone down almost to nothing. Raw cotton is down, but cotton goods are up. Hides have gone down so that they are scarcely worth taking off the animal, but shoes are still $12 and $18. Wool has gone down to a ridiculously low figure, but every kind of dress goods made of wool remains at war figures. Farming implements have gone down, and everything we buy at retail is sold to us to-day almost at war prices; yet the raw materials have gone down almost to prewar prices, and in some instances below.

I repeat what I said several days ago, that we have been engaged in the Senate in the last few months in passing laws to regulate profiteers. You passed a rent law which I believed was unconstitutional then, and I believe so now, to regulate rents, and the rent hog, if you please, is no worse than the clothing-store hog. I do not like to employ that term, because it sounds hard in a place of this kind.

We are told that the railroads are not making money; we are told that the great majority of the corporations are not making large profits; but there is a class of institutions in this country making enormous profits. The excess-profits tax for this year, if levied at the old rates, would raise $450,000,000. That means that somebody was profiteering in this country to the extent of a good deal over a billion dollars.

This would raise about a hundred million dollars. Not a penny of it would be paid by a taxpayer of this country unless that taxpayer had made more than 50 per cent upon his capital invested. I simply want once more to test the sense of the Senate as to whether they propose to relieve the profiteer even from a tax upon his profits above 50 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Missouri is calculated to convey the idea that the country abounds with corporations making 50 per cent. As a matter of fact, they are extremely rare, if not entirely nonexistent. They exist largely, and only, perchance, in the imagination of the Senator from Missouri.

The purpose of this legislation is to entirely purge the tax system of the excess-profits feature, which has turned out to be meretricious and bad and unfortunate from every aspect; and to retain it with its complications of administration for some kind of a strange animal which does not exist except in the imagination of some one hunting the monsters in corporate existence, and strange though logical forms, would not be reasonable.

It may sound well in certain circles, far from where an exact, logical knowledge of tax subjects is predominant, but it hardly becomes a body like the Senate of the United States, which is engaged in serious legislation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have 10 minutes on the bill which has not been at all employed, and I shall take that now.

The Senator from Pennsylvania states that I am hunting something which exists in the imagination. It exsts in the city of Washington. It exists in every city of the United States. The expert of the Treasury estimated that we would receive a hundred million dollars from this tax, which the Senator says is purely a zoological specimen existing in the imagination.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the experts absolutely deny that they made any such statement.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Pennsylvania is about as polite to-night as he has been for several days. The expert I have quoted is not near the Senator and he has not spoken to him. I am quoting the one man we have relied on for accurate estimates. If we would raise $450,000,000—and that was admitted on all hands—under the excess-profits tax as it now exists, we certainly have profiteers, and we have plenty of them.

The Senator intimates that this can not be administered, and yet we are living under a much more complicated law which we are administering to-day. What do Senators mean by standing in their places and saying that a law can not be administered which is being administered now?

The Senator says that this proposition may be popular in some places where they do not understand taxes. I suppose he means among the ignorant masses of the people. But there are places in the country where they do understand taxes, where they study taxes, where they study excess-profits taxes. It is in the directorates of the great rich and powerful concerns that are to-day exacting unjust profits.

I am making no fight upon wealth, I repeat; I am making no fight upon institutions merely because they are large; but I say that when an institution exacts 50 per cent of profit, be it a large one or a small one, it ought to begin to pay an increased rate of taxation. You levy, I repeat, upon the individual in proportion to his income. You levy upon the dead man in proportion to the size of his estate.

When you undertake to touch one of those concerns that is making excess profits through a corporate organization, undoubtedly the Senator from Pennsylvania knows of audiences where they understand the question, and understanding it, every man who has been celebrated for his adherence to corporations has been found in the Senate voting against any form of excess-profits taxes. I do not say that every man who has voted against an excess-profits tax is a man who has a corporate leaning, but I do say that every man with a corporate leaning has voted against the excess-profits tax.

I do not intend tamely to submit to any intimation that a tax on 50 per cent profits is a bit of imagination. Fifty per cent profits are being exacted in this town to-day, and every man with common sense who has had to buy anything knows they are being exacted daily and hourly and, as has just been suggested to me, the rent inquiries themselves clearly show it.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if no excess profits are being made or if they are rare birds, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] would indicate, but little harm can be done by imposing a tax upon a prosperity and a profit that does not exist.

Now, Mr. President, this condition as I see it prevails in the country right now. A short time ago we had a plethora of profiteers. I have not been inclined to denounce the man who earned great profits by that term if such profiteering does not imply a deliberate attempt by conspiracy with others engaged in similar business to bull the market.

During the time coal was sky high great mining concerns deliberately attempted to keep down the kiting of coal. I know of great concerns that sold coal at from $1 to $5 a ton less than they could have obtained for it in an open market because they believed it was an unhealthy condition.

A short time ago it was a buyers' market and everybody profiteered, if profiteering means making 10 or 20 or 50 per cent upon the investment. The farmer who had land worth $100 an acre made $100 clear money. The laborer who had a wage previously valued at $2 a day made from $5 to $10 a day. Now things have changed. This inordinate demand of hungry Europe, forced for the time to buy its necessities and munitions from us, is gone, and the tide of prices ebbs, and every business that is controlled by the law of supply and demand, whose prices are fixed by normal, natural, and legal conditions, will find its finished product down, and it should go down naturally as if drawn by gravity, with the fall of its raw material, the fall of its rents, the fall of the cost of labor.

But, Mr. President, the fact remains that in spite of the fact that raw material for all these concerns has gone down, every fiber, whether of wool or cotton or of silk, has gone down, fuel has gone down, lumber has gone down, the products of the farm—foodstuffs, cereals, grains, and things of that character, hemp and cotton and corn—have gone down and are still going down, labor has dropped, and yet certain commodities made from cheaper material and cheaper labor stay up. When this tide recedes and leaves a few businesses high and dry, what does it mean? It means that those businesses have combinations with others in the same business sufficiently powerful to resist the gravity of business law—the great law of supply and demand. It means that they have evaded the law. It means that they have the power, by the control of an essential commodity, by the manipulation of patents, by expanding in the form of trusts or otherwise, that enables them to make still greater profits.

You have it right here in Washington. You have just had an inquiry that shows that building materials are cheaper and labor is cheaper, and yet they attempted to raise rents 50 per cent, and you propose to give a bonus, you propose to exempt from taxation, you propose to exempt from the operations of the present law this sort of people. I tell you that the profiteer who is profiteering now is nine times out of ten a commercial crook or commercial gambler. It is either a game of chance, where the risk is so great as to make it a kind of gambling, or it is a crooked combination that is coining the sweat of unrequited toil, that is appropriating the raw materials of the farm at less than the cost of production by some illegal or at least some immoral strangle hold upon that business, and to allow a few monopolies, to allow a few crooked combinations in restraint of trade to continue to profiteer upon a falling market is to reward not legitimate business but it is to give an honorarium for crime. This is the most abominable and astounding proposition presented in the Senate since I have been a member of this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], which will permit the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and myself to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as heretofore and my inability to procure a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Announcing my general pair as heretofore and my inability to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before and my inability to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to make the same announcement with reference to my colleague [Mr. GLASS] that I made on the previous vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I find that I can transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which I do, and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 38, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment which the Senate has just had under consideration.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDGE. I offer an amendment to section 230, which was reserved for a vote in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Three Senators have made reservations regarding section 230—"tax on corporations." The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] offers the following amendment:

On page 79, line 3, after the figures "1921" and the comma, insert the following: "and for each calendar year thereafter" and a comma.

On page 79, line 5, strike out the semicolon and the word "and" and insert a period.

On page 79, strike out lines 6 and 7, which are in the following words:

"(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 15 per cent of such excess amount."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment which I have offered, if adopted, would be to retain the present corporation tax of 10 per cent. The bill now in the Senate as is well understood proposes to increase the general corporation tax to 15 per cent. I was very much impressed with the argument of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] a few moments ago in which he, in my judgment, very logically presented the indisputable fact that this tax, computed on any percentage, so far as that is concerned, is absolutely unscientific. It is all a matter of capitalization. In these days of peace to raise the general corporation tax without any consideration as to capital, but simply on the net income, on the capitalization of large corporations of, perhaps, hundreds of millions of dollars, and of small corporations with a capital of a few thousand dollars, and to tax all of them 15 per cent; in other words, in a time of peace, to increase the tax carried by a war measure 50 per cent, seems to me to be absolutely indefensible.

I recall the debate a few days ago when the Senator from Massachusetts submitted an amendment to this same section for the purpose of attempting somewhat to limit the corporations to which the increased tax should apply, and also when the Senator from Wisconsin presented a similar amendment. I am perfectly willing to admit that there was logic in the attempts of those Senators to provide some modification of the tax on a corporation with a small capital as compared to the tax on a corporation with a large capital when their relative net income is computed. I venture to say that every Senator on this floor has had letter after letter from corporations in the State which he represents calling attention to the fact that the repeal of the excess-profits tax really interested them but little, especially in these days when business has been gradually deteriorating, when the net incomes and the net profits of many corporations are under 8 per cent.

Hundreds and thousands of them I do not doubt to-day have a net income under 8 per cent; but suddenly, in times of peace, three years after a war, when we are compelled to impose unusual taxes, we say to all the corporations of the country, irrespective of the amount of their capital—and that is the entire question when we attempt to analyze it—that they shall pay the Government 50 per cent more than they paid during the time of war.

I thoroughly appreciate that a tax of 10 per cent is not any more scientific than a tax of 15 per cent, so far as that is concerned, and I do not attempt to defend it; but I do say that in these days, when we are attempting to rewrite a revenue measure and to lower taxation along lines where we can figure that it is possible to do it and still secure the necessary revenue to administer the Government, and when we are reducing the budget as we are reducing it, there can be no logical excuse for raising by 50 per cent the one tax which we all on both sides of the Chamber admit is absolutely unscientific.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the Senator a question. My understanding is that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, stated a few days ago that if we placed the tax on corporations at 15 per cent, there would be a margin above the estimate of what was required to defray the expenses of the Government for this fiscal year of only $10,000,000. Now, it is estimated that the 5 per cent tax on corporations will raise $267,000,000. With that additional tax stricken out, we shall have a deficit of $257,000,000 unless we impose some other tax for the purpose of raising the amount which would be necessary to make up that deficit.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I thoroughly appreciate that fact, but I recall an old axiom that still appeals to me as having a great deal of merit, that two wrongs do not make a right, and while I appreciate that these reductions——

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. EDGE. I am trying to answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina.

While I appreciate that the reduction of the tax from 15 per cent to 10 per cent will probably mean less in revenue by approximately $250,000,000, I still insist, speaking from my personal viewpoint, that the logical method of making up that deficit, instead of unscientifically taxing all classes of corporations without any consideration of their capital or of their net income as compared to their capital, would be to adopt a common-sense plan of a consumption or sales tax whereby everybody through purchasing would pay their proportionate tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. But that is a tax which has been voted down, not once but three times.

Mr. EDGE. I appreciate that it has been voted down, but that does not deter me at all at this eleventh hour from still registering my protest against another tax which is admittedly unscientific and unfair, when, in my judgment, it would have been very much better for the business interests of the country, both large and small, if we had adopted the other type of tax.

I am not going to ask for the yeas and nays; I never trespass upon the time of the Senate any more than is necessary to put forward the views that I may have of business and public problems, but I wanted to offer this amendment, and simply ask for a viva voce vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 79, at the end of line 7, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That the tax shall be 10 per cent of such excess amount in the case of any corporation, other than an insurance company subject to the tax imposed by sections 243 and 246, the net income of which for the taxable year is less than 8 per cent of the amount used as a basis for computing its capital-stock tax for the year beginning on July 1 of such taxable year.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I will accept that amendment for the purpose of giving it careful and thorough consideration in conference.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee what the loss in revenue will be in the event the amendment shall be adopted?

Mr. PENROSE. I am unable to state to the Senator the exact figures.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from North Carolina had an estimate some time ago, as I recall, of $130,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken; I have no recollection of an estimate of that kind, although I may have had; I can not say positively.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a very substantial amount, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. How does the Senator propose to make that up, or does he propose to do so?

Mr. LENROOT. In the first place, for the calendar year 1923, there will be ample revenue to make up the deficit, because, beginning with the calendar year 1923, as the bill now stands, there will be a surplus of something like $140,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator's amendment does not apply until 1923?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; it applies immediately. I am very frank to say that if in conference the amendment should be accepted as now offered it may be necessary to restore some of the excise taxes that have been stricken out of the bill, and yet it will be remembered that the original bill, as reported by the committee, would have yielded a surplus of $53,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to disagree with the Senator from Wisconsin about one proposition. I think that the class of corporations that he has put in the 10 per cent category are entitled to some preferential treatment, but I apprehend that there might be some trouble about the revenue. If the revenue were made up in some other way, I should not see any very serious objection to the Senator's proposition, because the corporations which the Senator singles out are in the class that are not paying the excess-profits tax.

Mr. LENROOT. No; that are not earning more than 8 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore they are not paying excess profits, and they do not get the same benefit from the repeal of that tax as do other corporations. So the 5 per cent tax added to them is rather a hardship, and I felt that it was a hardship that ought to be relieved against. I hope that we may find the revenue, but I fear there will be embarrassment about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Do I understand the Senator's amendment to provide that the corporation net income tax shall be 15 per cent, except in certain cases enumerated in the proviso, in which it shall be 10 per cent?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that it covers the same ground as did the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, except that he based his amendment upon the amount of invested capital. My amendment is based upon the average value of the capital stock, which must be determined in any event by the Treasury Department under existing law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My amendment had this additional good quality that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin has not, that in certain cases my amendment provided for a tax of 20 per cent on corporations—profiteering corporations—that were escaping the excess-profits tax. Such corporations would in certain cases have to pay a 20 per cent tax under my amendment, instead of the 15 per cent tax.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator reconcile this with the provisions of the bill providing for a 15 per cent tax?

Mr. LENROOT. There is no conflict at all. This amendment provides that in the case of any corporation earning less than 8 per cent upon the average value of its capital stock, determined as provided by section 1000 of the bill, such a corporation shall not have imposed upon it the increased 5 per cent but shall continue to pay a 10 per cent tax; but as to all corporations earning more than 8 per cent, they will pay the 15 per cent tax.

Mr. KING. Then the amendment would reach particularly public-service corporations?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; under existing circumstances it would cover most of them.

Mr. KING. And railroads and other public-service corporations?

Mr. LENROOT. It would.

Mr. President, I have just this to say:

Unless this amendment or some amendment similar to it is adopted the conferees will have no jurisdiction whatever to give relief to any corporation that is not earning a reasonable return. If this amendment is adopted, the conferees may then work it out, taking into consideration the matter of revenue. Of course they may adopt this amendment, or they may adopt some other plan that may be devised, so as to take care of these corporations that have never made excess profits and that are not making unreasonably high earnings now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, while I am in hearty agreement with the Senator from Wisconsin, and his amendment covers pretty much the ground of my amendment, and I think we both are striving to reach the same goal, I think my amendment has an advantage over his. Therefore I am going to move it as a substitute in a very friendly spirit. My amendment provides for a graduated tax and makes the rate of tax 20 per cent in certain instances, so that the difference between the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin and mine is briefly this:

Both amendments keep the present rate, namely, 10 per cent on all corporations that have not heretofore paid an excess-profits tax, or that have not earned 8 per cent upon their capital stock. In all other cases than that, his amendment provides for a flat tax of 15 per cent. My amendment provides for a flat tax of 15 per cent up to $300,000 of net income, and a tax of 20 per cent in excess of $300,000. Therefore I move my amendment, which I have sent to the desk and ask to have read, as a substitute.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand that if this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted, the relief for corporations with an earning of less than 8 per cent provided in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will be given in the Senator's amendment, and the loss of revenue resulting from that—to wit, $130,000,000—will practically be made up by the additional 5 per cent that the Senator imposes upon corporations with an earning in excess of $300,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly. A large part of it will be made up by that increase of 20 per cent in the rate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to amend the amendment. Therefore, the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is not in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand, then, that I shall have to wait until a vote is taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, and then present my amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, upon that I want to say one word before we vote.

The Senator from Wisconsin admits that this amendment will bring about a reduction of approximately $130,000,000 in revenue. The Senator from Wisconsin also says that we shall have to hunt around in some other realm and possibly reinstate some of the taxes we have stricken off in the Senate in order to make up the deficiency.

I believe there will be a great deal of difficulty in that; and although we all admit that if a corporation or an individual does not make over 8 per cent upon his investment it seems rather hard to tax him, nevertheless individuals will have to pay the tax whether they make 8 per cent or 3 per cent or 1 per cent, provided it is a profit; and it seems to me that we are going to be greatly embarrassed in the conference if we are forced to hunt around and find something that either the House or the Senate has not condemned in order to levy a tax upon it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether this bill is to be written in Congress or whether it is to be written by the conferees after we have gotten through with all this work? The talk we have been hearing here indicates that it is intended to get into conference and rewrite this bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, if it is in order, I should like to propose an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Then, Mr. President, I will speak to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

It is my opinion that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is adopted, we will exempt probably 90 or 95 per cent of the large corporations in this country from taxation of more than 10 per cent upon their net earnings, and we will not in any great percentage of the cases reduce the taxation upon the smaller corporations. It is a well-known fact in business circles that the smaller concerns, in order to prosper, necessarily have to make larger profits than the more extensively capitalized corporations; and the average corporation with a capitalization of $25,000 or $50,000 will in all probability, if it is prosperous, make more than 8 per cent, and will have to contribute then 15 per cent of its net earnings, while the corporation with, probably, $5,000,000 capital will not make 8 per cent, and will only have to pay upon a basis of 10 per cent upon its capital.

We know that in the business world large aggregations of capital, as a rule, do not expect so large a percentage upon their capital as does capital being operated in small sums; and I believe that the adoption of this amendment would work even a greater discrimination against the corporations of small capital, and it would certainly make even more glaring and more indefensible the discrimination which exists under the provisions of this bill against individuals and partnerships engaged in trade, because they would have the advantage of no such protection. The rate of taxation upon them would be a great deal higher. So I take the position that if it is a matter of trying to assist corporations that are struggling, and, you might say, those that are infant corporations, we could meet that by placing a limitation upon the capitalization of corporations that will enjoy the benefit of this exemption.

While I understand that the Chair has ruled it out of order, I had proposed to offer an amendment which would make this amendment read that corporations with $100,000 capital or less, in the event that they did not make in excess of 8 per cent net income, should be subject only to a tax of 10 per cent upon their net earnings. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will not be adopted, because I think it will work even a greater discrimination against the small corporations conducting businesses of moderate size, and it will discriminate in favor of large corporations that have great capitalization.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has very magnanimously suggested and agreed that I ask unanimous consent to have my amendment put first, as it is an amendment that is somewhat stronger than the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin; and as we are in perfect accord about the end and purpose in view here I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by me be put first and voted upon, and if that fails the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin can be put to the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, before that consent is granted I should like to know whether any estimate has been made upon the amendment now proposed to be offered as to how much it will reduce the revenue?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. At one time I was informed that it would not reduce it at all, that it would make no difference; but I think since the qualifying clause has been added, the proviso limiting the net-income tax rate upon corporations with earnings of less than 8 per cent on their capital stock, there will be a loss of approximately $50,000,000 to $75,000,000 of revenue. That is my information.

Mr. WILLIS. I shall not object to the request, as far as I am concerned. I think we ought not at this eleventh hour to go to slicing off fifty millions here and a hundred millions there without knowing where we are. I shall vote to oppose the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin temporarily withdraw his amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts being voted upon first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to strike out lines 6 and 7 and to substitute the following therefor:

(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 10 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income does not exceed $100,000, 15 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $300,000, and 20 per cent of such excess amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000: Provided, That a corporation which did not make a net taxable income of more than 8 per cent on its invested capital for the taxable year shall not be taxed on its net income more than 10 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement with regard to my pair that I did on the last vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and my inability to procure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore, and being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I desire to make the same announcement regarding my colleague [Mr. GLASS] that I made on the previous vote.

Mr. LODGE. I make the same announcement as on the previous vote, leaving the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 36, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to inquire how long it is expected to keep us in session to-night? I understand there are a great number of amendments yet to be offered; it is 10 minutes to 12 o'clock; and if we stay in session until we finish the consideration of the bill and the amendments that are pending, we are likely to be here all night. I suggest that as we have made great headway to-day we ought to quit.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator think we might vote on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin before we adjourn?

Mr. REED. For my own part, I would like to have an opportunity to study it. It was offered here on the floor under the 10-minute rule. I make the inquiry as to what is the intention of the acting chairman.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think everyone expected that we would get through with the bill to-day. We have called witnesses from all over the United States to appear before the Committee on Finance on the agricultural schedule. We have kept them here now for nearly a week, each day expecting to take up that schedule of the tariff bill and to hear the testimony. The committee has been kept here much longer than it expected, and it seems to me that now, under the 10-minute rule, with the number of amendments which are still outstanding, we ought to be able to close the matter up to-night. I hope we may do that, even though we all feel that it is a great inconvenience.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course the majority has control of the situation. All we can do is to abide by its decision; but we are carrying this almost to the point of cruelty, in the face of the fact that there has been no waste of time. I use the term "cruelty" advisedly. It might cause some smiles, but I have seen similar tactics carried on in the Senate, and I have seen two or three Senators die as a result of it.

I do not expect to die as a result of our work on this bill; I can stand it quite as well as any man in the Chamber; but my understanding is now that if we go on, we shall probably have to stay all night; and I do not think there will be much business done in any hearing to-morrow if we stay here all night.

Mr. President, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know the parliamentary status of the amendment which is now sought to be amended by the Senator from Wisconsin. Has it not already been accepted in the Committee of the Whole, and is it not a part of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). It has been accepted in the Committee of the Whole, but it is open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. REED. Exactly; but if it has been accepted in the Committee of the Whole and incorporated into the bill, and an amendment is offered to it in that shape, why is not an amendment to the amendment permissible? Would it not be in the same condition in a parliamentary sense as though an amendment had been offered to the general text of the bill, and an amendment was then offered to that amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly; I am just making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LENROOT. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is now pending, and my amendment is an amendment to that amendent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not yet been concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. REED. If the amendment was concurred in, would it then be open to further amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not without a reconsideration of the vote by which it was concurred in.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to know what the ruling might be, in order that I might govern myself accordingly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before we vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin I want to state that in a conversation I have just had with the actuary he told me that the loss of revenue as a result of this amendment would be $175,000,000, instead of $130,000,000. I think that under those circumstances the best thing to do is to retain the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, and if the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is defeated that would be the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the committee amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to say that the amendment I now offer is exactly the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts in his proviso, except that my amendment is based upon the average value of capital stock, while his was based upon invested capital.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I am unable to obtain a transfer, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair that I made on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as heretofore and my inability to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I announce my pair as before and my inability to obtain a transfer. I therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. If the Senator from Nebraska were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Brandegee	La Follette	Newberry	Phipps
Edge	Lenroot	Nicholson	Pomerene
Ernst	Lodge	Norbeck	Smoot

So Mr. LENROOT'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to section 230, corporation taxes, as amended.

The section as amended was concurred in.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 201 two Senators have made reservations regarding paragraph 22, Senators EDGE and SUTHERLAND. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] moves, on page 201, line 5, in the amendment to the committee amendment, after the word "except," to insert the words "petroleum jellies" and a comma.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, this is simply an amendment to perfect an amendment already adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Senate has already eliminated from section 2 the provision subjecting these articles to a tax of 4 per cent. In the exception at the end of the section the same words should appear in order to perfect the paragraph. My amendment is simply to carry out that thought.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment reserved for vote in the Senate.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] reserved an amendment on page 125 under the heading "Returns to be public records."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask to have that amendment reported. There are two amendments which were taken together as presented in Committee of the Whole and voted upon together. If they can be considered together in the Senate, I shall be glad to have that done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 125, under the head of "Returns to be public records," strike out lines 2 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 126 strike out lines 1, 2, and 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 257. That when the returns of any person shall be made as provided in this title, the returns, together with any correction thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the Treasury Department and shall constitute public records and be open to inspection as such under the same rules and regulations as govern the inspection of public records generally.

On page 126, line 10, after the word "addresses," insert "and amount of income."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the Secretary may read that provision as it would read if the proposed amendment should be agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. So that portion of the amendment would read:

The commissioner shall as soon as practicable in each year cause to be prepared and made available to public inspection in such manner as he may determine, in the office of the collector in each internal-revenue district and in such other places as he may determine, lists containing the names and the post-office addresses and amount of income of all individuals making income-tax returns in such district.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon this amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just one word. The Senator from Wisconsin the other day presented in a very strong manner the multitudinous arguments in favor of this amendment. It is not a novel proposition. The law during the Civil War and for a long time subsequent thereto made available for consideration the returns which were filed, returns which were of the same character as those contemplated by this act.

In the States the returns made by the taxpayers are open to the public. I think the experience in all our States has demonstrated the wisdom of provisions of this character. I think it makes for honesty, for integrity of the taxpayer, and it relieves the people from the suspicion which so often pervades our taxation system that many are seeking to avoid the payment of a just and fair tax.

Mr. President, there has been a feeling and expression has been given to it repeatedly during this debate, that many of the large corporations as well as many of the large individual taxpayers have not dealt fairly or honestly in the rendition of their tax returns. I believe that this provision would do very much to mitigate the criticism which has been offered, and lead people to a better understanding and certainly to a better feeling with respect to taxpayers and the methods of collecting taxes, particularly from the rich.

When the Senator from Wisconsin submitted his argument no reply was made, and, in my opinion, none can be made. I can not for the life of me understand what opposition there can be to a measure which makes for fair taxation and is in the interest of an honest and fair return, to the end that a just and fair tax may be collected from the taxpayers of our country.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, upon this question I entertain the same view that I held in September, 1916, when the same question was before the Senate. The then junior Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Husting, whose untimely and tragic death we all regretted, introduced an amendment proposing to make income-tax returns public. After rereading my speech upon that amendment I am convinced that I can add nothing to that argument, and I am going to read a few of the sentences which I uttered that night:

Mr. President, the previous remarks in behalf of this amendment have covered the ground so well that it would seem to be a work almost of supererogation for me to say much more; when we establish the policy of an income tax, as we have by our constitutional amendment and statutes made thereunder, as a logical, necessary, and inevitable result it should follow that the returns under the income tax should be made public.

As has been asked here, Is this public business we are about? It is. Why, then, say to the public that they shall not have access to the tax return? Are such returns "private" public documents? No, Mr. President; they are not private public documents. They ought not to be private. Go into the assessor's or tax collector's office of the various counties in the States of the Union and you can ascertain all the facts from the tax returns. Any citizen may walk into a tax collector's office, assessor's office, or the office of the clerk of the board of supervisors and say, "Let me see your tax books, please; let me see the assessment of Mr. John Smith, Mr. William Jones, or Mr. HENRY ASHURST."

The humblest citizen of the State is accorded that privilege in every county in which I have ever been in this Union. Why, then, Mr. President, should these great interests that wield such tremendous power be permitted to file an affidavit and a return and make payment of taxes upon that return when it is not subject to review, not subject to investigation?

If the full light of publicity were thrown upon the return, if many inquiring eyes were turned upon it, the truth would be discovered. If there be nothing wrong about the return, why this secrecy?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to offer one observation that may or may not appeal to Members of the Senate. We are dealing here with the problem of raising a revenue of $4,000,000,000; we are levying taxes to apply to all classes of citizens, yet we do not know the amount of taxes that are paid. We are denied knowledge as to the taxes which are paid by particular interests. We have been guessing at them as best we could. When the Committee on Finance was dealing with the bill and we asked for information from the experts with reference to how an excess-profits tax would affect corporations and what classes of corporations would be affected by it, we were not permitted to have the names of the corporations; they were given to us by number. We had to grope in the dark; we are groping in the dark now. Disputes have occurred on this floor as to what particular corporations of the larger sort would be affected by a particular amendment and how they would be affected. We who are engaged in the business of levying these taxes have denied ourselves the source of accurate information. I say that it is a stupid piece of business for Congress to undertake to legislate with reference to taxes and not have access to tax returns.

It is true we got an amendment into the bill under which we could obtain tax returns by a resolution of Congress. Why should they not be open to the Congress? If we are ever to get them by resolution of Congress, why is it not proper now to pass a law so that we shall have them without passing such a resolution on some special occasion? We ought to know what we are doing. We ought to know how the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] a few moments ago would affect the small corporations of the country. We know nothing about them except what we can get out of Poor's Manual or some other book that does not give us complete information. To talk about legislating with reference to taxation and then to refuse to find out the effect of the present law and the amount of taxes that have been paid seems to me to be stupidity of the grossest character. So I submit the amendment offered ought to be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore regarding my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement concerning my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. STERLING]. Being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS (when the name of Mr. WATSON of Georgia was called). My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 79, after the word "amount," in line 7, it is proposed to insert the following proviso in the committee amendment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is not in order unless there shall be a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I was necessarily out of the Chamber for a few moments, and during that time apparently, according to the announcement of the Chair, section 230 was concurred in without a record vote. I hope unanimous consent may be given to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was concurred in for the purpose of acting upon the amendment I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the vote by which section 230, as amended, was concurred in may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore in regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement with regard to my pair as on the last roll call, and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as I made heretofore as to being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with regard to my pair and its transfer as on the last ballot, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. Making the same announcement as heretofore in regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I find that I can transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I do so and vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 36, as follows:

So the motion to reconsider was rejected.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The last amendment reserved and unacted upon is found on page 198, reserved by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. The question is on concurring in the action of the Senate in striking out the amendment of the committee placing a tax of 2 per cent on chewing gum or substitutes therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to know the form of the vote. Is the proposition that the tax shall be stricken out, so that an affirmative vote would be to strike it out, or is the proposition to restore it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the action of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, which did strike it out.

Mr. REED. Very well. I do not intend to discuss it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then a vote in the affirmative sustains the action of the Committee of the Whole in striking it out and a vote in the negative is against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair, I vote "yea."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as I have heretofore made, and being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last ballot relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Gooding	New	Spencer
Bursum	Hale	Newberry	Sutherland
Cameron	Harris	Nicholson	Townsend
Curtis	Keyes	Oddie	Warren

Ernst	McCumber	Phipps	Willis
Fernald	McKinley	Poindexter
France	Moses	Shortridge

NAYS—26.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Heflin	La Follette
Broussard	Gerry	Jones, Wash.	Lenroot
Capper	Harrison	King	McKellar
McNary	Pittman	Shields	Walsh, Mass.
Myers	Pomerene	Stanley	Walsh, Mont.
Norris	Reed	Swanson
Overman	Sheppard	Trammell

NOT VOTING—36.

Borah	du Pont	Kenyon	Simmons
Calder	Elkins	Ladd	Smith
Caraway	Glass	McCormick	Stanfield
Colt	Harreld	McLean	Sterling
Crow	Hitchcock	Norbeck	Underwood
Culberson	Johnson	Owen	Wadsworth
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Watson, Ga.
Dial	Kellogg	Ransdell	Weller
Dillingham	Kendrick	Robinson	Williams

So the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which paragraph (22), on page 201, was agreed to, in order that I may move to strike it out. I was out of the Chamber when that paragraph was reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to make an objection to any request of that kind, but just about five minutes ago the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] made a similar request on the same ground and it was voted down by, I think, a solid vote on the other side of the Chamber. I am not going to object to this request, but I call attention to the circumstance.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I do not like to object, but I do think both sides ought to be treated alike. I am going to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I move to return to that section on page 201.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to reconsider the vote by which paragraph (22) on page 201 was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary question. Is it necessary to move to reconsider this section in order to move now, as a direct motion, to strike out one word or two words or three words from it? I do not so understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It ought not to be when the request is made from this side, of course. If the request is made from the other side, it would be necessary, as a matter of course, to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that it is necessary to move a reconsideration. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 126, after line 20, insert the following new paragraph:

> The commissioner shall make a report to Congress on the first day of each regular session, stating the name and residence of each person delinquent on the 1st day of the preceding July in tax payments, and the amount of tax due from such person and unpaid.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate and ask it to listen to any extended argument in support of the amendment. It is a proposition to bring to the attention of Congress the slackers in taxation.

I know of no reason why the representatives of wealth, who stand for property to the amount of something like one or two billion dollars, who have not paid their taxes, should not be reported, not only to the Congress but to the country. The War Department gave to the country the names of the slackers in the draft. They were rather careless about it, and they published a good many names of men who had gone to the front, some of whom had given their lives in the late war.

I can conceive of nothing more reprehensible than tax dodging. It is possible, as in the case of those designated as slackers in the draft, that there might be the publication of some names of those who had some answer to make, some excuse to offer, some explanation to give, for the fact that they had not reported fully to the Internal Revenue Commissioner upon the amount of their incomes. But upon making that explanation, they would be exculpated, just exactly as those were exculpated who had been reported in the matter of the draft improperly.

So I ask for the adoption of this amendment, and I ask for a roll call on it. Let us know who the men are who are dodging their taxes in this country.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether or not it would reach cases where the taxpayer in good faith was contesting the claim of the Government, and perhaps was in the courts, or before the proper tax tribunal, to determine the amount of taxes?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think in that case all those facts would appear.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKINLEY (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). Being unable to secure a transfer and making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last vote relative to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—29.

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson
Broussard	King	Overman	Trammell
Fletcher	La Follette	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.

Dial	Kendrick	Robinson	Williams

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I offer the following amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 294, after line 8, insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 1403. In case of farming and live-stock corporations and public utilities whose rates or charges are subject to regulation by law or administrative action pursuant to law, the rate of taxation upon the net income of such corporations shall be 10 per cent only, regardless of the amount of the net income, and notwithstanding any other provisions of this act.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am proposing this amendment in the very best of faith, and I believe that if Senators could understand what it means there would be no objection to it. Of course, I understand that such an amendment would more properly be attached to section 233, but the Senate did to-night what it very seldom does; it declined to reconsider the action upon that section, which was taken while I was temporarily absent from the Chamber.

I would like to have Senators understand that under the bill they are increasing the taxes of every farm and live-stock corporation in the country by 50 per cent and they are increasing the taxes of all the public utilities of the country by 50 per cent. That is what the provisions of the bill will do. There is not one of these concerns that is to-day earning excess profits, that is earning above 8 per cent of the invested capital, a fact which is thoroughly known to everybody in the land.

If there is an industry in the entire country which deserves consideration at the hands of this Congress, it is the farming and live-stock industry. Every enterprise of that sort in this country is operating to-day at a loss. Senators know it, and to raise their taxes now by 50 per cent upon all their net income, regardless of its amount—and that is what Senators are proposing to do in this bill—I say is not right. It is an imposition upon struggling industries in the country which are producing the necessities of life.

Your food supply is going to be exhausted; your live-stock men are going out of business. If they are to be taxed 15 per cent flat upon their total net income, it will be found that very few will be induced to invest a dollar in those industries and proceed to produce the necessaries of life in this country.

It is not sufficient to say that no amendment will be accepted which is proposed on this side of the Chamber, as Senators on the other side have apparently determined to do. They must consider the situation of the country. They must consider the interests of those people who are struggling to get on their feet, to try to recover from the great losses which they have sustained and which they are sustaining, the farming industries of the country, the live-stock industries of the country, those who own the sheep and the cattle, those who raise them for the purpose of furnishing food. Do Senators intend to raise their taxes 50 per cent? That is just what they would do under this bill as it is now framed.

Consider the public utilities of the country, whose incomes are regulated by law. Their taxes are to be raised 50 per cent. The railroads of the country, that are struggling for existence, are calling upon Congress now for half a billion dollars, trying to get that money out of the Treasury for the purpose of keeping themselves going. You are going to increase their taxes by 50 per cent.

I ask you if you can excuse or furnish any reason for this discrimination against the taxpayers of the country? Are you going to increase the taxes by 50 per cent, by one-half, upon these struggling concerns which admittedly are worthy of special consideration by the Congress? You propose to loan or to advance to them half a billion dollars.

You are selling securities out of the Treasury to-day so as to let these struggling public utilities have some money with which to carry on their business and to keep them out of bankruptcy, but by the bill as you have it framed you increase their taxes 50 per cent.

I do not believe that on reflection you ought to tolerate anything of that sort. Is it possible that you are doing it for the purpose of reducing the taxes upon these corporations which are making a higher percentage of profit on their invested capital? That is what you have done here to-night. You have removed all excess-profits taxes. You have declined to put upon the corporations earning high percentages of profits any tax different from that which you put upon all corporations. You are absolutely giving to those concerns making a high rate of profit upon their invested capital a reduction of taxes, a reduction which, it is estimated by all the experts, will amount to $450,000,000, and you are trying to make up $260,000,000 of that by levying a flat tax upon all corporations and increasing the tax on these public utilities, on these struggling live-stock corporations and farming corporations, by 50 per cent. I wonder what will be said about this matter when just what is proposed here to-night is realized.

On reflection, now consider the proposition. You are increasing the taxes of the farming corporations and live-stock corporations and public utilities by 50 per cent. The only excuse for it is that you want to cut off the excess-profits taxes of those corporations which are making high percentages of earnings upon their invested capital. I submit, Mr. President, that this can not be justified, and therefore I propose the new section which has just been read at the desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am utterly opposed to imposing upon the railroads and public utilities of the country an income tax 33⅓ per cent less than we impose upon other corporations. It is true that the railroads are not making large returns upon their invested capital. It is likewise true that many individuals in the country who will have to pay from 25 to 30 per cent income taxes are making a very small percentage of earnings upon their invested capital.

I think this is a proposition to discriminate in favor of the railroads and the public-utility corporations in the country to a very unreasonable extent, and I trust that the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico will not prevail.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico. It is to strike out in the fourth line, after the word "corporation," down to and including the word "law" in the eighth line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received as proposed by the Senator from Nevada. It is in order because it is a new section. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in lines 4, 5, and 6 the words "and public utilities whose rates or charges are subject to regulation by law."

Mr. PITTMAN. It strikes out all reference to public-utilities corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was very anxious about revenues when the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offered his amendment, and he wondered how we were going to get along without the $130,000,000. The amendment that is offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] will take at least $200,000,000 off. It will cost the Treasury at least $200,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am opposing the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I simply wish to state to the Senate, if the Senator from North Carolina has taken that position, although I understood him otherwise, that the proposed amendment will cost at least $200,000,000 of revenue to the Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has not the Senator already spoken once on the pending amendment?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have not spoken upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

I merely wish to say this much in regard to the statement made by the Senator from Utah as to the amount of revenue which the amendment would lose to the Treasury. If what he has said is true, then it is important that some provision be made for a change. If practically all of the revenue derived from corporations is to be taken from those corporations, it is a woeful situation. But that can not be. Here is what the situation presents.

It is expected by this bill to raise $400,000,000 by the 10 per cent flat tax, and then it is only expected to raise $260,000,000 from the additional 5 per cent upon all corporations.

If Senators will just figure that for a moment it will be seen that the Senator from Utah certainly on reflection should change his estimate, because if 5 per cent on all the corporations will produce only $260,000,000, and by excluding those corporations we lose $200,000,000, just imagine what we are doing to the poor, struggling corporations of the country which are earning only a small amount upon their capital stock. The Senator from Utah can not be correct in his statement and on reflection I am sure he will not insist that out of the $260,000,000, $200,000,000 is to be raised from the farm and live-stock corporations and from public utilities. That can not be. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. President, I see that there is great objection developing here to the amendment to the section as I propose it because it includes the public utilities of the country. I believe they ought to have some relief. The Senator from Utah is opposing it on the ground that we lose $200,000,000 of revenue. Others are opposing it on other grounds. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico as modified.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have a few amendments to offer. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment? I wish to propose another amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; I will withhold my amendment for the present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state to Senators that this is an amendment which I offered in Committee of the Whole but put in a little different language. I am not going to ask for a yea and nay vote on it, but I do want to get it in the record in the amended form, so that we may all know just what the final form is in which I offered it.

It is an amendment to section 230. I suppose the amendment would be ruled out on a point of order if I were to offer it as an amendment, but under the circumstances I am sure there will be no objection.

On page 79 I propose to amend by striking out lines 6 and 7 and inserting:

(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 10 per cent of such excess amount plus the sum of the following:

Four per cent of an amount of the undistributed net income equal to 10 per cent of the net income; or, if the undistributed net income is less than 10 per cent of the net income, 4 per cent of the entire undistributed net income;

Eight per cent of the amount by which the undistributed net income exceeds 10 per cent and does not exceed 20 per cent of the entire net income;

Twelve per cent of the amount by which the undistributed net income exceeds 20 per cent and does not exceed 30 per cent of the entire net income;

Sixteen per cent of the amount by which the undistributed net income exceeds 30 per cent and does not exceed 40 per cent of the entire net income;

Twenty per cent of the amount by which the undistributed net income exceeds 40 per cent and does not exceed 50 per cent of the entire net income;

Twenty-four per cent of the amount by which the undistributed net income exceeds 50 per cent and does not exceed 60 per cent of the entire net income; and

Twenty-eight per cent of the amount by which the undistributed net income exceeds 60 per cent of the entire net income.

The proposition is 10 per cent on the undistributed net income, the idea being to have a flat tax on corporations of 10 per cent, and these graduated taxes only upon the undistributed net income. I offer the amendment for the record, and I ask that a vote on it may be taken without a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 148, after line 17, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That in addition to taxes heretofore levied by this section a tax of 6 per cent shall be imposed upon the value of the securities of such estates so transferred, by whatsoever authority issued, which securities have not been taxed under the Federal income or excess-profits tax laws and which were issued prior to the passage of this act, and that upon such tax-exempt securities issued subsequent to the passage of this act the additional tax so levied shall be 10 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate for any extended discussion upon this amendment. I merely want to say that this is the amendment which I offered as in Committee of the Whole, excepting that I have changed the rate from 10 per cent on securities heretofore issued to 6 per cent and from 15 per cent upon such securities which may be hereafter issued to 12 per cent.

Mr. President, I do not want to ask the Senate to listen to any other argument upon this amendment than that which I heretofore offered when the amendment was presented as in Committee of the Whole. All I ask is that we may have a roll call upon the amendment as now offered. I want a record vote upon this amendment. If I may have that, I am content.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I am surprised at the Senator's moderation, and I hope the Senate will promptly agree to his request.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I had not quite finished.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, I thought the Senator had. Well, I am ready for anything, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is likely to get anything before I am through. The readiness with which my request for a yea-and-nay vote has been granted leads me to say that I would not be entirely frank with the Senate if I did not let them know what I propose to do with these roll calls. I propose, Mr. President and Senators, to distribute the roll calls upon this bill well over the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. Good work!

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is good work. The Senator from Pennsylvania does not know what good work it is. Let me just tell the Senate. For example, I remember being in Evansville, Ind., a few years ago. I was about to address a chautauqua. I was waiting at the hotel for the time when I would be expected to appear on the platform. A United States Senator who resided in Evansville waited upon me at my hotel, and he said to me, "I have come to take you up to the Chautauqua. I am going to introduce you to the audience." I said to him, "Senator, I do not think you had better do that. I am going to discuss before that audience this afternoon the legislation that has been before the United States Senate during the session that has just closed, and I am going to review your record among those of other Senators upon that legislation, and I do not think that it would be entirely agreeable to you to be on the platform. I suggest to you that you let somebody else introduce me to that audience."

The Senator felt very sure of himself, and he said to me, "Oh, never mind about that. You can not say anything that will be harmful to me here, where everybody knows me. You go up there and say just what you please to that audience. This is my home; the people are my friends. You can not make any report upon my record in the United States Senate that would be harmful to me."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. REED. We have a very unusual proceeding going on here. A Senator is making a speech upon an important bill and singing and carousing are going on in the cloakroom. I simply want the facts to go into the RECORD that that is the way this business is being transacted.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Missouri refers to the Republican cloakroom.

Mr. REED. Everybody knows what cloakroom it is.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I entirely differ from the Senator from Missouri. After what has happened Republican Senators are singing a requiem in there. Let them proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, to resume what I was saying to the Senate, I said to the Senator I merely wanted to be entirely frank with you. I do not think you ought to introduce me to that audience. I prefer to go up to the Chautauqua grounds and, if necessary, introduce myself. He said, "Oh, get into the carriage; come along with me. You can not say anything in this town that would be harmful to me." Well, I got in the carriage and went up with the Senator. He was manifestly very popular with the people who made up the audience, and when he introduced me he was greeted with cheers and applause. I began my address to that audience, which was a very large one, and, I think, representative of the people of that community. I explained to them the legislation that had come before the Senate during that session. Then I read the roll call to them upon each piece of legislation. As I drew on toward the name of the Senator who had introduced me, in the reading of the first roll call, I noticed that it produced a very marked impression upon the audience.

After I had covered one or two pieces of legislation, as I came to read the roll call and approached the name of the Senator who introduced me, it was received with hisses that drove him from the platform. When I had concluded my address to that audience, Mr. President, I found the Senator who had introduced me outside of the auditorium pacing back and forward, and he said to me, "Senator LA FOLLETTE, I have no complaint to make of you; you were perfectly fair with me, but if I had known how hot it was going to be in there on the reading of that roll call, I would not have introduced you." That Senator was defeated. The roll call upon his record retired him from public life.

Mr. President, this is a representative Government. I believe that the voters have a right to know how they are represented in the Senate. The record that has been made upon this bill is going to the country. Let Senators understand that they are going to be confronted with the record that they have made here. If it is one that they can answer for, that is well, but I question, Mr. President, whether Senators will be able to meet the record that has been made on this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know my time must have expired by now. I ask for a record vote on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore in regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and vote "nay."

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution passed by the National Board of Farm Organizations in reference to the excess-profits tax. I shall not ask that the resolution be read. It is short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

NATIONAL BOARD OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, D. C., November 1, 1921.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

With all possible earnestness the National Board of Farm Organizations appeals to you, the Members of the United States Senate, that you do not repeal the excess-profits tax, lower the surtaxes in the higher brackets, or by other means, such as by the proposed sales tax, shift the burdens of taxation from those best able to those least able to pay.

The payment of the war cost is a staggering proposition at best, and unless the laws that gather the revenue are equitably laid a very unjust and crushing burden will fall upon those least able to bear it.

EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

The excess-profits tax law carries an 8 per cent exemption. The average farmer would be very glad to receive a total net profit of 8 per cent, and in fact is now receiving far less. In view of the above-mentioned exemption, the present tax is paid by those fully able to pay. The contention that this tax is passed on to the consumer can only refer to those cases when monopoly directs the distribution and sets the price. We earnestly request that this tax be not repealed. To do so would entail a loss of revenue of $450,000,000.

SURTAXES ON INCOMES.

Millionaires and multimillionaires who would benefit from a reduction of these surtaxes are those chiefly interested in the repeal of the present act. We appeal to you to see that as against the interests of the few the welfare of the vast majority of the people shall be served.

To win wars two things are essential—men and money. When the Government wanted men it went into the homes of those who had the proper type of boys and took them for the welfare of the Nation. You face now the second part of the conflict—furnishing the money to pay for the war. By every rule of fairness, therefore, you should go where money is to be found and require it of those who can spare it with the least sacrifice. England has courageously met this issue, and under far more difficult circumstances is collecting a large proportion of her revenues from the incomes of those best able to pay.

We have a right to expect that you will conscript the wealth of the Nation with the same courage with which you called our manhood into the war.

Respectfully submitted by direction and on behalf of the National Board of Farm Organizations, now in session in Washington, D. C.

C. S. BARRETT, Chairman.
CHAS. A. LYMAN, Secretary.

Senate concurrent resolution No. 7, by Mr. Warren, memorializing Congress to repeal the Federal estate tax.

Whereas it is the opinion of the foremost tax authorities of the Union that inheritance taxes should be wholly reserved for the use of the several States, as shown by resolutions of the national tax conferences from 1907 to the present time; and

Whereas inheritance taxes have not heretofore been imposed by the Federal Government except as emergency measures in time of war; and

Whereas the Federal State tax now in force imposes an unduly heavy burden of expense upon the estates of deceased persons, in addition to the tax itself, and out of proportion to the revenue received by the Government and seriously interferes with the administration and delays the final settlement of estates: Be it

Resolved by the Legislature of Louisiana, That Congress be, and it is hereby, memorialized to repeal the Federal estate tax; be it further Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolution be forwarded to the Speaker of the national House of Representatives, the Vice President, and the Senators and Representatives from Louisiana.

I hereby certify that the above Senate concurrent resolution No. 7, by Mr. Warren, was adopted by the Legislature of Louisiana on October 27, 1921, and signed by the lieutenant governor and president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives.

O. H. SIMPSON,
Secretary of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CUMMINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2649) to extend the benefits of section 260 of the Judicial Code to Walter I. Smith, United States circuit judge, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 312) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8442) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 313) thereon.

DEFERRED GRAZING FEES.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide that deferred grazing fees received prior to December 31, 1921, shall be considered as receipts of the fiscal year 1921.

Mr. PHIPPS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It has been approved by the House.

Mr. LENROOT. May we have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read for information. The Assistant Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for the purpose of apportioning the 25 per cent of the accrued receipts from national forests during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, which are due and payable to the States under the act of May 23, 1908, and the 10 per cent of said receipts which may be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture under the act of March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., 828), for the construction and maintenance of roads and trails within the national forests, all moneys which are received by the Secretary of Agriculture prior to December 31, 1921, as deferred grazing fees authorized to be so paid under the act of March 3, 1921 (Public, No. 367, p. 18), shall be considered as receipts of the fiscal year 1921.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. WILLIS. Will the Senator from Colorado state whether it is likely to lead to discussion?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think it will lead to any discussion whatever, or I should not have asked for its present consideration. My information is that it deals with only a very small amount of money, odds and ends that drift in, collected this year which should have been collected last year. It is largely a matter of bookkeeping, and the joint resolution will simplify the operations of the Department of Agriculture in making up their accounts for the present fiscal year. The department officials are desirous of having the joint resolution passed so that they can settle their accounts more expeditiously than they can do otherwise. The amount of money involved is inconsiderable.

Mr. WILLIS. With the understanding that it will not lead to debate, I shall not object. I am very anxious to proceed with another matter.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yesterday I introduced a Senate joint resolution 133, being a constitutional amendment relating to the government of the District of Columbia. I noted on it that it should be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Some one changed the reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is investigating and holding hearings now upon the general proposition with reference to the government of the District of Columbia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

COURT OF INTERNAL-REVENUE APPEALS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am sending to the desk and introducing a bill to organize the United States court of internal revenue appeals. I beg the indulgence of the Senate for just a minute.

As Senators are advised, we have a United States Customs Court of Appeals. That court, I think, has been of tremendous service to the entire public. The total dutiable imports of the United States during the calendar year 1920 amounted to $3,117,010,682. We have just passed a revenue measure. I am advised that during the past year there were 4,425,114 taxpayers. The bill just passed seeks to raise revenues estimated at $4,000,000,000, and perhaps a little in excess of that; in other words, the total internal-revenue taxes of this country are about 25 per cent in excess of the total cash value of all dutiable imports for the past year.

My correspondence has been burdened with letters during the past year suggesting the organization of a special internal revenue court of appeals for the purpose of hearing and determining more expeditiously disputes which arise in the Internal Revenue Commissioner's office. Senators recognize the trouble we have had in understanding the bill which has been under observation and study here for weeks. We can, therefore, well understand the difficulty that taxpayers are going to have to understand the new tax law.

I do not mean to suggest that the bill which I now introduce is in its best form. It is fashioned after the act creating the Customs Court of Appeals. I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for their consideration and report.

The bill (S. 2687) to organize a United States court of internal revenue appeals was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator from Ohio object to having the bill go to the Committee on Finance? The bill providing for the Customs Court of Appeals was referred to that committee. That bill had to do with customs matters, and the bill now introduced by the Senator from Ohio has to do with the financial and revenue affairs, which are directly under the control of the Committee on Finance. I should, therefore, think the bill ought to be referred to that committee. I merely suggest that reference to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. As the bill relates to courts and affects questions of appeals, and so forth, I thought it more nearly related to the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee. I am willing, however, to be guided by what may be the judgment of the Senate. There certainly could be no objection to the two committees conferring together about the bill, and I am going to leave it to the Senate to determine as to which committee the bill should be referred.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Ohio will remember that the bill providing for the Court of Customs Appeals went to the Finance Committee, and this being a bill having to do with matters pertaining to the revenues of the Government, I think should be similarly referred.

Mr. POMERENE. I may say that the act providing for the Customs Court of Appeals was passed before I came into the Senate, and so I have no personal knowledge on the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely make the suggestion to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I repeat, I am willing to leave the matter to the judgment of the Senate. My own thought, however, was that the bill should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I am not particular about its reference.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the Finance Committee has its hands full right now.

Mr. POMERENE. I feel this way about the matter: I know that the Finance Committee is going to have the tariff bill before it, and it has been pretty well loaded down with work, and very important work. I think the subject involved in this bill is a matter which is going to be of very great importance to the taxpayers, and there will be need of a court to determine questions which will be constantly arising, not only questions of law but questions of fact. It is for that reason, among others, that, in my judgment, the bill should be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not going to object to such a reference of the bill. I simply call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Finance Committee are familiar with the details of all these matters; they have all the information as to what action should be taken relative thereto. I am rather in sympathy with the suggestion contained in the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio, and I have not the least objection to it being referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, although I believe that committee will have to study the technicalities of the questions involved, which are already so well understood by the Finance Committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I repeat, I am willing to abide by the judgment of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REAR ADMIRAL BOWLES ON NAVAL POLICY.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by Rear Admiral Bowles on the subject of limitation of armament and an editorial from the Springfield Republican based upon the letter.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Springfield Republican, Oct. 4, 1921.]

A DEFINITE PROPOSAL FOR LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS—REAR ADMIRAL FRANCIS T. BOWLES, FORMER CHIEF CONSTRUCTOR OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY, URGES THAT ALL BATTLESHIPS AND SUBMARINES BE ABANDONED AND SCRAPPED, LIMITING FUTURE WARSHIPS TO 15,000 TONS AND NAVAL CANNON TO 6-INCH CALIBER.

To the EDITOR OF THE REPUBLICAN:

If it can be assumed that in the coming conference in Washington, which opens on November 11, to discuss primarily the limitation of armaments, there is a real consensus of opinion to actually and materially reduce the world's military force, both navies and armies, then the practical problem of how to effect the reduction is a very interesting one.

No man wants to go into a fight for his life or for that of his family with one arm tied behind him, even if his opponent is similarly handicapped. The stake is too great; he must be able to put forth his full strength. Nations when they fight under such conditions must also ultimately put forth their whole strength.

The reasons for the present wish of people to reduce armaments are principally the vast increase of the cost of modern war, the consequent greater cost of preparation, the present inconvenience of the use of so much money as is required by adequate preparation on what must be for some years an economic waste at a time when the maximum of thrift is a necessity to make up the loss of the last war. The further and permanent reason is that complete preparation for war undoubtedly makes wars more frequent and peace less secure, militarists to the contrary notwithstanding. It is desirable to limit armaments for the same reason that men are forbidden to carry concealed weapons.

ENORMOUS INCREASE IN COST OF UNITED STATES NAVY.

The Navy of the United States for 25 years up to 1915 was a popular institution even at a rising cost of $100,000,000 a year. The Navy, under pressure to economize, asked for five hundred millions for the current year. An officer of the Navy of experience publishes an elaborate article in a current number of a service journal to the effect that the Navy, after due consideration of "economy" must have as a minimum 170,000 men and 7,200 line officers, with 436 fighting ships of various types maintained at all times in full commission.

He says "the Navy can not be ready for such operations (viz, immediate offensive) when there is maintained an active regular force of not less than 170,000 men with corresponding officers and an organized seagoing reserve of not less than 120,000 enlisted men with corresponding officers."

The author does not mention the number of the "corresponding officers" in either case, but specifies 7,200 line officers for the active Navy. If to that number are added the usual proportions of staff and warrant officers, the total of active officers would not be far from 12,000.

COST OF $1,000,000,000 A YEAR "IN PLAIN SIGHT."

Such numbers are in plain sight on the basis of ships built and authorized and the probable annual cost of a billion is also in plain sight.

It seems almost as if our Navy officers were out of their minds, especially as our cost for a given quantity of fighting power is very much greater than for other nations.

Figures indicating that the Navy's cost may soon equal the whole cost of the Federal Government before the war are enough to give pause to the most ardent advocate of a strong Navy.

The United States is unquestionably better able to maintain a superior navy than any other nation, and, notwithstanding its greater cost, accomplish the result with less burden to the individual citizen, so that even if the conference fails our bankruptcy is not the one to be feared.

It would appear, however, that the conference might succeed if the relative prestige of the principals was not changed by the method of limitation adopted and each principal power felt confident that there existed no possible means of evasion of the limitation; that the same simple rules applied to all and there could be no secret force unless by absolute open breach of faith.

HOW THE INCREASED COST HAS BEEN BROUGHT ABOUT.

The great increase of cost of modern navies has been primarily due to the fact that the modern science in metallurgy and electricity and mechanical invention in prime movers (motive plants, including steam engines or turbines) has rendered possible and advantageous an enormous increase in size of battleships, whereas for tactical and strategic reasons the tendency is to maintain the same number of units as when the ships were smaller. The same reasons have increased the caliber and power of great guns as well their accuracy and rapidity of fire, all tending to increase the cost of construction, maintenance, and use, as well as the number of officers and men for each unit. Since 1900 battleships have increased three to three and a half times in size and five to six times in cost.

Coincident with the increase of cost and power of the battleships has been an increase in the number and efficiency of its minor enemies, particularly the torpedo, the submarine, the airplane, and the mine. The increase of the minor enemies has increased the number, cost, and size of the adjuncts of the main battle fleet, namely, the battle cruiser, the destroyer, and the air fleet.

The increase has been geometrical and shows no sign of retardation. It exists not only in the fleet itself but in the number of fleet auxiliaries, in the capacity and number of shore stations and the much higher standard of personnel, both men and officers.

SUGGESTED LIMITATIONS THAT COULD NOT BE ENFORCED.

Navies are currently compared by tonnages of ships available for active service, sometimes separating the tonnage of the first line or most modern from that of the second line or reserve, sometimes comparing the tonnage of first lines when ships, building or authorized, are completed at a given future date.

These methods are very rough and highly empirical unless subjected to most careful analysis, and even then are doubtful, for all countries do not publish all the facts.

It is barely conceivable that it would be possible to arrive at a limitation of navies by tonnage. Such a method would be very difficult to agree upon and could not be enforced.

Similar difficulties would be encountered by limitations of cost or limitation of new units to be added to an existing fleet. Limitations based on enlisted men, coast line, population, wealth, exposed property, would lead to insoluble questions in the attempt to agree and would materially alter the prestige of the nations.

THE COMPLETE SOLUTION—ABANDON THE BATTLESHIP AND SUBMARINE.

Therefore, it would appear if there is to be a real limitation equally applicable to all, simple of application, and not necessarily altering the relative position of naval powers it must be a radical one, real and not make-believe. If this be the purpose of the conference the method is easy. Abandon the battleship!

Let it be agreed that all battleships, all fighting ships of any type over 15,000 tons displacement, all guns over 6-inch caliber, and all submarines be at once scrapped and for the future forbidden. The problem would be solved. There is no other complete solution.

Such a solution would be to the advantage of small States but need not finally alter the relative power of large ones. If it were desired to further handicap the naval architect in the development of the types of vessels remaining at his disposal, it might be also provided that the use of any protective armor plating be forbidden.

WOULD REDUCE NAVAL EXPENDITURES 75 TO 90 PER CENT.

The limitation of naval armaments by the abandonment of the battleship, big guns, and the submarine would probably result in decreasing naval expenditures by 75 to 90 per cent and would effect a considerable but not so great reduction in the cost of coast defense, which would become easily effective against the type of cruisers and destroyers of which navies would then consist. Such navies could still make blockades effective and would be efficient commerce destroyers though merchant vessels if armed might put up a fair fight. Under such limitations it would not be necessary to raise the question of freedom of the seas which if it were declared would be an aid to the warlike.

The limitation of land forces is a much simpler problem and an effective example is contained in the provisions of the Versailles treaty as to the German Army. It does not appear to have been noticed that the one advantage given by the treaty to Germany is the economic relief of the cost of an army and navy.

Land armies can be effectively limited by the number of men with the colors and in the trained reserves.

FRANCIS T. BOWLES.

BARNSTABLE, September 27, 1921.

ADMIRAL BOWLES'S PROPOSAL FOR LIMITING ARMAMENT.

The radical proposal for the limitation of armaments made by Admiral Bowles in his letter to the Republican will attract international attention, because of its nature and its source. It may be called impossible by many professional military men. But Admiral Bowles is himself of that profession. He rose to be the chief constructor of the United States Navy before he resigned to become the head of the Fore River Shipbuilding Co. As chief constructor and as private shipbuilder he designed and built many famous war vessels particularly of that class, the battleship, whose complete abandonment by agreement among the powers he now urges.

It is to accomplish the impossible—to do what the world has never been able to do before—that the Washington conference has been summoned. If it fails to provide a definite and practical limitation, it would have been better for the Harding administration, for this country and for all the nations of the earth, if the conference had never been conceived. Its failure would be a confession that in the face of the present emergency the world's statesmanship is bankrupt. An intensification of international distrust and fear would follow. The bankruptcy of statesmanship would leave unbarred the fatal road to economic bankruptcy and war.

Admiral Bowles traces the causes of the immensely increased cost of naval maintenance, quotes the seriously written demands of a typical professional militarist for the further expansion of our naval establishment, and sums up the financial aspect with the statement that, unless an agreement for the limitation of armaments is arrived at, a naval expenditure of a billion dollars a year is in sight. It may be added that, failing such an agreement, the United States must face the further cost of enlarging the locks, if feasible, of the Panama Canal or of rebuilding the canal to sea level. Otherwise the largest battleships will soon be incapable of passing through the canal and we shall be forced either to forfeit the military advantage of the canal or to build battleships smaller and less powerful than those of other nations in order that we may still use the canal to transfer them from ocean to ocean in time of need. These developments are inevitable.

The locks of the canal, thanks to an increase of 10 feet in their design before construction was finally undertaken, are 110 feet wide. The beam of the biggest battleships now under construction is 105 feet. A much tighter fit in effecting the passage of a ponderous craft displacing over 43,000 tons can not be risked. If the conference should fail, it would be the immediate duty of the War and Navy Departments, acting in collaboration, to consider plans by which the canal could be enlarged.

Even with the added cost of remodeling the canal—the amount of which can only be conjectured—it remains true as pointed out by Admiral Bowles that "The United States is better able to maintain a superior Navy than any other nation * * * with less burden to the individual citizen." But can the world as a whole survive, without the eventual collapse of present civilization, the ruinous waste of unrestricted military competition? John Moody, speaking in this city less than a week ago, was the last of many economists to remind his audience that normal prosperity can not return to this country until the other countries are able to get back upon their feet. They can not do that while struggling under an undiminished military burden.

The United States can not do less than offer, the other powers can not do less than accept, some measure for the limitation of armaments which shall be fundamentally and sweepingly effective. Otherwise the foundations of our civilization will be in peril.

CONSTRUCTION OF APPROVED IRRIGATION PROJECTS.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] introduced a bill which was misreferred. The bill contemplates the appropriation of public funds for the construction of irrigation projects in the State of Washington. Anyone familiar with the act which created the Reclamation Service knows that all matters in respect to reclamation must go through the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. If we are going to maintain the order of reference which has been usual and customary in the past, I seriously object to the bill introduced by the Senator from Washington being referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire that the bill shall go to the committee to which it naturally belongs, namely, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have no objection at all to the bill going to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, if that is the proper committee to which it should be referred, but I should like to make a statement as to the exact nature of the bill. My understanding is that the function of the Committee on Reclamation is to authorize reclamation projects and to deal with legislation relating to that subject. The bill which I have just introduced is not intended for that purpose. The sole object of it is to secure an appropriation to carry out work upon projects which have already been approved.

The Senate is familiar with the fact that quite recently there was held here in the city of Washington at the call of the President of the United States a conference which, I believe, was called the conference on unemployment. One of the recommendations made by that conference, as a means of securing employment for the unemployed of the country, was the inauguration of work immediately upon reclamation projects which had been authorized, surveys of which had been completed, which had already been favorably reported by the Secretary of the Interior, and in connection with which all necessary legislation had been enacted except the appropriation. My understanding is that there is no committee that can authorize the appropriation or recommend it to the Senate except the Committee on Appropriations. So it seems to me, that being the sole object of the bill and the matter ultimately having to go to the Appropriations Committee, that it should go there directly; but I submit the matter to the Chair and to the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I concede the reasonableness of the purpose that prompted the Senator to ask that the bill go to the Committee on Appropriations. The question of unemployment was considered by the conference appointed by the President, and that conference made certain recommendations. Acting upon those recommendations, the senior Senator from Oregon and Mr. ADDISON T. SMITH, Representative from Idaho, some days ago introduced bills in the respective bodies covering this identical subject matter. Hearings have been had upon those bills, and they are in advance of the suggestion of the Senator from Washington; but, even so, the Senator, I think, is absolutely in error in respect to the machinery he is attempting to employ to determine whether an appropriation should be made by the Congress for the purpose of irrigation.

I can say, Mr. President, in a word, that the status of all those matters is simply this: Before an appropriation for an irrigation project can be made by Congress a bill must be introduced in the Senate; it must be referred to the appropriate committee, namely, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, which was formerly known as the Committee on the Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands. That committee then refers the bill to the Secretary of the Interior, whence they go to the Reclamation Service, by which a survey is made, irrespective of whether the bill relates to an uncompleted unit of a project or a new project. A report is then made by the President of the United States, and if he determines the projects are feasible, acting under the advice of the Reclamation Service, a bill comes to Congress seeking an appropriation.

The particular bill introduced by the Senator from Washington seeks to appropriate certain money from the reclamation fund to build a specific project in a particular State; and I sincerely and seriously object to the bill being referred to any other than the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator misunderstands the bill in that particular. It does not ask for money for a specific project or in a particular State.

Mr. McNARY. Then I am mistaken as to that. I merely heard it read at the desk.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The amount provided for in the bill is made up according to the total number of projects which the unemployment conference mentioned as being ready for construction. They are situated in various States; and the terms of the bill are entirely general and cover projects which have been approved and which are ready for construction.

Mr. McNARY. I may be in error as to any particular project in any particular State being covered by the bill; but that simply aggravates the matter. No one employment conference has a right to determine what is a feasible project. That is an engineering problem, and it must go through the natural course.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I will say that this bill makes no reference at all to the unemployment conference. I only mentioned that conference as a reason for the introduction of the bill, the purpose being to take advantage of whatever influence could arise from the action of the President's conference on unemployment.

I am aware of the other bills to which the Senator has referred, but I do not know what their present status is. The purpose of this bill, however, is to get immediate action in the way of an appropriation. It does not relate to any project for which surveys are necessary; it can apply only to projects, surveys of which have all been completed, and which have already, as I understand, gone through the entire process of reference to the Committee on Reclamation, authorization by legislation coming from that committee, and now awaiting appropriation from the Congress for the commencement of work upon them. This bill has for its sole object the appropriation of money for that purpose.

Mr. McNARY. I conceive that the Senator again is in error. The Secretary of the Interior has not passed upon these projects. Some of them have been determined as feasible. There are great questions about others.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, to what projects is the Senator referring? This bill does not mention any particular project. It refers to projects which have been approved; and if the Secretary of the Interior has not passed upon a project, then this bill would have nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. McNARY. A list which I sent for some time ago in connection with report made and recommendation by this Congress. That is what I have in mind. Inasmuch as it relates to the history of this transaction, I want to develop it all. I seriously object to the bill or any similar legislation going to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, under a law passed eight or nine years ago the reclamation fund was practically destroyed. Up until that time it was a unit, and the Reclamation Service could use the funds out of it as it saw fit without further act of Congress. At the time of the passage of the Alaska Railroad bill there was an amendment included which really caused all of the so-called reclamation fund to go into the General Treasury; and while as a matter of bookkeeping the amount is kept separate and requires a separate appropriation, nevertheless the fact is that there is not a sufficient fund available for all of the reclamation projects in which the Government desires to continue. It therefore comes down to an engineering determination as well as an economic determination as to how this insufficient amount of money shall be strung out, so to speak, to keep all of these projects moving. That can only be practically determined by the Reclamation Service; and there is one committee that has been appointed by the Senate to be an intermediary between the Senate and the Reclamation Service, and that is the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, of which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is chairman.

Mr. McNARY. If the Senator will yield at that point, I will say that it is quite true that the accretions coming to that fund from the sale of public lands and the royalties from oil-land leases are not more than sufficient to maintain the present machinery and to construct a few only of the uncompleted units of projects heretofore recognized by the Congress as being needed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I say there are not sufficient funds to go around. If separate bills calling for appropriations for distinct projects are referred to the Appropriations Committee, that committee, in ascertaining whether or not that appropriation shall be recommended in whole or in part, will be compelled to make exactly the same investigations that are constantly made by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I agree with him in what he says in so far as any such case as he has described is concerned. Any case where it is necessary to make any investigation, or where any legislation is necessary to secure the authorization of a project, should go to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. I have not the slightest desire in the world to detract one iota from the jurisdiction or dignity of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and I am perfectly willing for this bill to be referred to that committee if it is the proper committee, but that is not an appropriation committee. It can not make appropriations, and this bill calls for nothing but appropriations. It is in general terms. It can have no application to any reclamation project which has not already gone through all the processes of legislation with which the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation could in any way deal. What would the committee do with this bill if it were referred to them? All that they could do would be to determine whether this appropriation should be made or whether it should not be made. That is the function of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not think that is entirely the function of the Appropriations Committee, because they are asked to appropriate from a special fund.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; again the Senator misunderstands the bill. It calls for an appropriation from the general fund of the Treasury, to be repaid ultimately out of the reclamation fund.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly, because that is the law. As I have already stated, there is no reclamation fund except as a matter of segregation of bookkeeping. All of the proceeds that are supposed to go into the reclamation fund, like the royalties from oil leases, go directly into the United States Treasury. It is only a matter of bookkeeping as to how much there is. Nevertheless, in my opinion, Congress is not going to appropriate any more than exists in that fund as shown by the bookkeeping.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, if that is the case, there is very little hope for employment of the unemployed on reclamation projects, because it has already been stated that there is no more in that fund than enough to carry on the work which is already under way; in fact, there is not enough for that purpose. The purpose here is to secure money from the General Treasury, outside of the reclamation fund, to be repaid from the reclamation fund when that fund has been replenished, as it undoubtedly will be, from the returns upon these great projects after settlement has been established, and the magnificent agricultural yields which come from them are being enjoyed. Then there will be money to repay this, but that will be some years in the future.

Mr. PITTMAN. The same trouble is involved in that proposition. The money that is supposed to be appropriated for the particular project or projects of the Senator must come out of a fund that is for the mutual benefit of a great many different projects.

Mr. POINDEXTER. This is not a particular project or projects. It relates to approved projects which are now ready for construction. There may be some one or more in the Senator's State, so far as I know. There are one or two in my State, and I know there are some in different States. They have been listed and referred to in the report of this conference on unemployment, but that is not stated in the bill, and if those that are listed there do not come within the general terms of this bill they could not receive the benefits of the appropriation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Would not the Senator like to have the very question of fact that he has stated determined by the appropriate committee?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What question of fact?

Mr. PITTMAN. As to whether or not it does reach all of the projects that have been authorized; as to whether or not it is a sufficient amount; as to whether or not it is too much. All of the questions involved in the development of the irrigation projects are involved in this application for appropriation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is not anything of that kind to be determined, because the bill says "approved projects." If they have not been approved, of course it does not apply; and in so far as the amount of the appropriation is concerned, that has always been the jurisdiction of the committee dealing with the appropriations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I have a moment?

Mr. McNARY. The Senator from Nevada has the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will yield the floor in just a second. I was just going to say that although I am in hearty sympathy with the Senator's bill I am afraid that if it comes back with a favorable report from the Committee on Appropriations we will be involved in a long discussion in attempting to ascertain the facts essential for its passage.

That is all I have to say.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the two Senators—in fact, the three Senators—are all right, in a way, in their claims. It does not matter to which committee the bill goes as to its final outcome. The condition is that as to the regular income already provided for by law it is divided, and recommendations come to the Committee on Appropriations from the Reclamation Service and are usually accepted as they send them. The Senator from Washington proposes to add to that fund a certain amount, named in his bill, which becomes a straight appropriation from the Treasury of the United States.

Without prejudging what the Committee on Appropriations will do, it has been the custom—and I think it ought to be the custom—that before appropriating any large amount of money in addition we should have the services and recommendations not only of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation but of the Reclamation Service itself. I think it can make no possible difference in the end where the bill goes, because the Committee on Appropriations will not assume authority to run over the Reclamation Service nor the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, the bill introduced by my colleague was referred to the Appropriations Committee. What is pending before the Senate now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] to change the reference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not know that the Senator had made any motion.

Mr. McNARY. I made the motion some time ago.

As a final word, Mr. President, the Senator from Washington has introduced a bill here to appropriate $16,500,000 to finish some projects that have been determined feasible by the engineering corps of the Reclamation Service. He says that is a final matter. I say it is not an adjudicated matter or a settled matter. The Reclamation Service have recommended projects that are all feasible, that will require the expenditure of $131,000,000. Here is $16,500,000 to be appropriated. A selection must be made somewhere. Some one must determine that matter. Some committee that has jurisdiction must investigate and determine, out of that great field of projects, which one is the most appropriate upon which to have this $16,500,000 expended. It becomes a matter of very serious consideration by the committee. It involves hearings, some of which have been had upon similar legislation. I say, Mr. President, as a member of a committee to which all legislation of this kind is referred for investigation, involving as it does many engineering problems and the application of provisions of law, that it seems very absurd for this particular bill, which is similar to others now pending before the committee upon which hearings have been had, to be referred to the Appropriations Committee. I protest against that course most seriously. If we are to maintain orderly procedure in this body, and if each committee is to have referred to it those bills which are properly the subject of reference, this bill should go to the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I suggest that the bill be read. Possibly the bill is so framed that it is a pure appropriation bill, and on the face of it there might not be very much question as to the proper reference. I do not remember hearing the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill (S. 2700), as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, from any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $16,200,000, to be used by and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the carrying on of work as promptly as possible upon the construction, or completion, of reclamation projects which have already been approved, authorized, and surveyed, and estimates for which have been made and which are now ready for construction or completion. The foregoing sum shall be charged by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Federal reclamation fund in the nature of a loan, and the same shall be repaid to the Secretary of the Treasury from the proceeds of the reclamation revenue when the same shall be available for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is the amount $16,200,000?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is.

Mr. BORAH. It has all the appearance of having been the subject of estimate by somebody already. The amount is $16,200,000. I take it somebody has passed on it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There has been an estimate. That was taken from a table of figures which was made as to the number of projects. I am not insistent at all about the committee to which it should be referred. My only object is to get the money. I want to get action, and, as the Senator from Oregon says, other similar bills have been referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, perhaps this bill should be referred to that committee; but I did not know that any appropriation bill had ever been referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Chair will order the reference changed to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ALLEGED PREFERENCES TO FOREIGN VESSELS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration. Before doing so, I want to make a brief statement, showing why it should be passed. The facts are so clear and so startling that I am sure there will be no objection to it.

We are all much interested in the development and building up of the American merchant marine. I think we all realize, to a great extent, the difficulties and the problems which confront us, and the influences which tend to hamper and prevent the establishment of our merchant marine.

I sometimes think, however, that our people do not realize all of the influences and difficulties which confront us, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to some facts which I think will startle some Senators. Some of the Members of the Senate are doubtless acquainted with these facts, but I venture to say that a situation exists with which many Senators, and most of the people of the country, are not familiar.

Some time last summer it was called to my attention that there are agreements between various railroads of this country and foreign steamship lines for the transportation of the products of this country to foreign markets whereby our railroads obligate themselves to favor these foreign ships in various ways, and it was suggested that those agreements must be on file with the Intertate Commerce Commission. Acting on that suggestion, I wrote a letter to the Interstate Commerce Commission, under date of May 20, 1921, which I will ask to have printed in full in the RECORD. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it, but in my letter to the commission I asked for a statement as to the facts of this matter. They wrote me under date of June 10 that there were no agreements on file, but that there had been at one time one agreement placed on file somewhat of this character, but quite a while ago.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. In my letter I called their attention to the transportation act. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is just leading up to what I was about to ask him.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I said, Mr. President, in my letter to them I called their attention to a provision in the transportation act requiring the filing of agreements with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and they say in this letter, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, that they have not called upon the railroads for any agreements, but they say further:

The matter being called to the attention of the commission, it was directed that a special statistical series circular be drafted requiring of the carriers the return to our Bureau of Statistics on or before June 30, 1921, copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements, etc.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator will get to it, but I wrote the Interstate Commerce Commission subsequent to that date, and they informed me that there were agreements on file, and invited me to come and examine them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall call attention to that. I ascertained before the recess that copies of agreements had been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. I did not have time to examine them before I went out home and I have not had the time to do so since I came back. I have seen various references to those agreements, quotations, and statements with reference to what they contained, and I have this morning a letter from the National Merchant Marine Association calling attention to the situation, which letter I am going to ask to have printed in full in the RECORD and ask to quote briefly some paragraphs to get the facts before the Senate.

The letter sets out the order of the commission, under date of June 10, 1921, in which they directed the carriers to submit copies of contracts and agreements between them and steamship companies engaged in the foreign trade, and so on. The letter then goes on to say that there are a number of these contracts, and also calls attention to the fact that during the year 1920, according to the figures submitted by the roads, over 2,000,000 tons of freight destined for foreign markets were transported by the railroads and delivered to foreign steamships in our ports. It also calls attention to the fact that not only have many of the principal railroads entered into agreements with the foreign steamship lines but that they have also bound their subsidiary companies to furnish freight to these foreign steamship lines and give them special favors.

Here is a list of some of the railroads which have entered into these agreements——

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The statement that railroads have entered into contracts to deliver their freight to certain foreign steamship companies is, of course, a very interesting one to the American people, but is the Senator able to advise us as to what the reasons are for these agreements? In other words, are these contracts entered into with the foreign steamship companies because they get better rates or what is the reason?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I shall call attention to some of the provisions of these contracts, and the resolution I am about to introduce will call on the Interstate Commerce Commission to send to the Senate copies of the contracts, and information with reference to rates, and so on. Then, if we want to investigate to ascertain the reasons why these contracts are entered into, that will be for subsequent action of the Senate, although probably it will clearly appear from the contracts themselves as to why it was done.

Some of the railroads which have entered into these agreements are the Pennsylvania System, the Boston & Albany (New York Central), the Baltimore & Ohio, the Philadelphia & Reading, the Boston & Maine, the Grand Trunk, the Norfolk & Western, the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic, the Missouri Pacific, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul.

This letter gives a synopsis of what these agreements provide for, and I hope Senators will notice this, and I hope the country will have it brought to its attention. Among the features in the various agreements filed are:

Free wharfage and dockage, use of warehouses, and so forth.

That is, the railroads agree with those foreign steamship lines that they will furnish them free wharfage, dockage, use of warehouses, and so forth, in order to carry their freight.

Special piers set aside by railroads for foreign lines.

Exclusive use of facilities without charge.

They give the foreign steamship lines exclusive privileges and facilities without charge.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the Senator says they grant them exclusive privilege without charge for docks, does not that mean to the exclusion of American shipping?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. That is carried in two provisions. But the Senator will understand that I have not examined these contracts, and I am just reading from the letter, which states that this is what the contract provides, so that I am not able to tell the Senator very definitely except as this gives the information. I think the statement is correct, but I can not speak from a personal examination of these contracts.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The reason why I ask the Senator is that that is a very important proposition. If American railroads have given the exclusive privilege to use their railroad docks to foreign vessels it is to the exclusion of the American merchant marine which the Government has built up.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Absolutely. Another provision is—

Reduced rates of freight. That is another privilege given, and they bind themselves to do it by these agreements, as I understand it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it not a fact that those agreements were made, too, at a time when the Government was furnishing the money and operating the railroads?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true; and we are asked now to fund the indebtedness of the railroads which are giving these special privileges to foreign steamship lines.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it may be of interest to Senators for me to give them a little information which came to me several months ago. In my own home city we have two large plants manufacturing enameled ware. One of those plants was seeking markets in South America. They have a New York office, which looks after their export trade. They wrote me telling me that when they were seeking rates on ships of the United States Shipping Board to Brazil and Argentine ports they found that the United States Shipping Board was giving German manufacturers of enameled ware better rates from German ports on American vessels to Brazil and Argentina than they were willing to give to the Canton plant for its products from New York to the same Brazil and Argentine ports. If there is any defense which can be made of that mode of procedure, I would like to know what it is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not know what defense could be made to it. What I have particularly in mind now, however, is to call attention to these contracts between our railroads and foreign steamship lines whereby foreign shipping is favored and given special privileges.

In the interest of getting along rapidly, I ask that I be not interrupted until I am through with this. All I wanted to do this morning was to call attention to this, and then have the Senate pass the resolution I am about to offer. I do not think there will be any objection made to it.

The next provision is for—

Special demurrage agreements.
Pledges to work together against competitors.
Railroads contract to deliver goods as far as it is in their power to specified foreign lines to the exclusion of other lines.
Exemptions agreed to be sought by railroads for foreign lines from port, pilotage, and lighthouse dues and local taxes.

In other words, our railroads bind themselves to use their influence to secure these steamship lines exemption from taxation, local dues, and so forth.

Railroads agree to make every effort within reason to secure amount of freight required by foreign lines.

While our shipping is being laid up for lack of cargoes, our railroads are bound by agreement to use every possible effort to furnish cargoes for foreign ships. Possibly that is one of the reasons why many foreign ships are running from our ports while our own ships are lying idle. Here is another provision in these agreements:

Coal to be supplied for rates always below the market and never above $5 per ton.

This is an agreement that the railroads of this country will furnish foreign steamship lines coal below the market price and never above $5 a ton.

Pledges made to obtain cargoes at rates required by foreign lines.
Railroads not to issue through bills of lading other than by steamers of specified foreign lines.

I remember that in the transportation act we had a provision which was considered very important, under which it was made possible to have through bills of lading from interior points of this country to foreign markets, and so on, and yet here is an agreement by these railroads not to issue through bills of lading other than by steamers of specified foreign lines.

Preference to be given by railroads to freight tendered by contracting foreign lines over any other freight offered by any other shipper or corporation.

We have complained about practices in Japan and other countries under which they delay our ships from getting cargoes, and yet here we have some of our own railroads bound by agreements with foreign lines to delay shippers in this country getting ships for their cargoes.

Now, Mr. President, there is a great deal of talk about failure to enforce the provisions of the American merchant marine act. There is one provision of that act that has caused possibly more trouble than all others that is intended to favor American lines; that is section 28. Out on the Pacific coast some of the strongest opposition came to the enforcement of that provision. I have here the secret of that opposition. Here is one contract:

There was an agreement executed between the Osaka Shosen Kaisha and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway. Section 6 of this agreement reads:

"It is further mutually agreed by the parties hereto that all freight tendered to the Osaka Co. by the St. Paul Cos. shall be given the preference over any other freight tendered to the Osaka Co. by any other corporation or shipper, the St. Paul Cos. advising the agent of the Osaka Co. details of amount of freight contracted for next sailing, and the St. Paul Cos. to likewise give the preference to through freight tendered by the Osaka Co. to any other freight tendered to the St. Paul Cos. by any other corporation or shipper."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I merely wish to inquire the date of those agreements.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This agreement was executed in 1908 and ran until April 1, 1919.

Here is a significant fact:

A letter signed by R. M. Calkins, vice president of the St. Paul, addressed to the president of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, under date of June 13, 1918, states:

"There is no intention on the part of this company to cancel this contract. In fact, we hope that it may continue in force and that the friendly relations which have been maintained for the past 10 years between our companies will continue indefinitely. Due to the present Federal administration of American railways, it is not advisable—and I doubt very much whether it would be possible—for us to enter into a formal renewal of this contract; but, as I have already stated, we trust that it will continue in force, with possibly some slight modification, that may be brought about from time to time by the new Government regulations.

"You must understand, however, that at the present time we have no authority to make any pledges or promises, and the situation, as I have outlined it, is the personal opinion and desires of both our president and the writer, and we sincerely trust that our friendly relations may continue uninterruptedly."

They could not under the law and regulations enter into a formal contract to renew the contract which they had made, so they had a gentleman's agreement to continue it in force. Here is a statement in this letter to me:

The other leading Japanese steamship line, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, has had an agreement with the Great Northern Railroad Co. and the Great Northern Express Co., a part of which pledges the companies to make their best endeavor to secure for the steamship line, from port authorities, exemption from, or reduction in, port, pilot, or lighthouse dues, taxes, or other charges having reference to both through and local cargo, parcels, and passengers.

Mr. President, there is another statement here as to a contract between various eastern railroads and certain steamship lines. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it, but it will appear to-morrow morning in the RECORD.

Without taking further time of the Senate, I present the resolution and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know whether the Senator has any information on the subject or not, but speaking with reference to the forces operating to discourage the upbuilding of the merchant marine, playing into the hands of foreign shipping, among those undoubtedly have been American railways, American shippers, and American financial interests, cooperating with foreign shipping interests as against American ships. That has been the case.

I do not know whether it is the same sort of thing that continues or not, but I heard recently that when Mr. Hoover, for instance, in his official capacity goes out and acquires an immense quantity of goods to go to Russia, and he is shipping to Russia cargoes of goods, all those goods are moved in British ships.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Probably they have to go that way under the agreements under which the railroads are operating. Probably Mr. Hoover knew nothing of them when the freight was carried.

Mr. FLETCHER. Possibly that accounts for it. I can not understand how we can ever hope to build up an American merchant marine unless American citizens have some patriotism about them and show a desire to use American ships.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are going to have to take heroic steps and we are going to have to look after our interests. We must have created among our people what the Senator from Florida has suggested—an intense American spirit. We will not get an American merchant marine until we get something of that kind developed in the country.

I did not intend to go into any general discussion this morning. There are other matters probably in the morning hour that ought to be taken up. I did want to get copies of these agreements and statements officially before the Senate from the Interstate Commerce Commission—these agreements and the amount of freight that has been handled. That is my sole purpose.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Idaho rose first, so I yield to him.

Mr. BORAH. I have no objection to the resolution which the Senator presents, but I venture to say, in view of information which has been given to me, that, as the Senator has said, there will have to be very drastic action and a very thorough and searching investigation in order to get all the real facts in regard to the matter. A gentleman whose name I do not feel privileged to use, but who is known to the entire Senate and who is in a position to know, stated to me within the last week that the situation was exceedingly serious, that the combination which had been made and the influences which were working for its success ought to be uncovered, and nothing, to use his language, but the most heroic action and the most thorough and searching investigation would uncover the facts. We can get those contracts and we ought to have them, but I think there is a resolution pending here——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have a resolution pending for an investigation which I hope to call up to-morrow morning. If I may be permitted, I will say that these contracts are 15 or 20 in number. I have copies of many of them and have had all of them very carefully examined. I have been so very busy in the last few weeks and so occupied with other matters that I have not been able to go through them thoroughly myself. I think the resolution should be passed and the Senate should be in possession of the information that it seeks.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator is going to call up his resolution to-morrow morning, I have nothing further to say at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish merely to add that we may have to have a much broader investigation. Probably it will not do to assume the facts. I have taken the position myself and based my action on the assumption that these things actually exist in this country, and that our foreign competitors will use every possible method that they can to keep us off the sea. So far as I am concerned, I do not need any investigation to convince me that there are these great powerful influences in the country that are cooperating with foreign interests to the detriment of the building up of an American merchant marine.

In my judgment, the only way we will ever build up an American merchant marine is not only to have created a patriotic sentiment throughout the country in behalf of such merchant marine but we must be willing to do whatever is necessary to aid it. The administration must enforce the law which we have placed on the statute books. That law was enacted for American interests. Its provisions were intended to arrest foreign aggression and discrimination. If carried out, it will arrest them. If the administration will enforce the law, it will go a long way toward stopping the practices that are carried on to our injury. I have been hoping that we would have more energetic enforcement of the provisions of the law that Congress passed in order to meet these things than we have had. I know it takes time. The new agencies should be given a chance, but unless something is done pretty soon it will be a great reflection upon the administration. Rumors come to me and statements are made by correspondents that the administration has decided not to enforce this provision, not to enforce that provision, of the merchant marine act of 1920. I hope it is not so; but if it is, then we may well despair of building up an American merchant marine.

Mr. BORAH. No; what we want is further investigation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Investigation will not do it.

Mr. BORAH. It will build up public opinion and public opinion will enforce the law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Possibly so, and that is exceedingly desirable. Anything that will lead to the enforcement of the law will be well worth the cost.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if we are going to discuss the question as to whether we are going to have an investigation or not, I want to get my resolution before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, I do not ask that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the resolution of the Senator from Washington be laid before the Senate now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers a resolution, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 169), as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all agreements on file with it between railroads in the United States and steamship lines or companies operating from ports of the United States in the foreign trade, and to give the Senate all information in its possession with respect to the amount of freight handled under each of such agreements.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington asks for the immediate consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether he thinks it will lead to extended debate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the resolution would have been passed if the Senator had not interrupted. I think it will pass without discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD the letters to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE,
May 20, 1921.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Recently my office communicated with your office to learn what, if any, copies of contracts were on file with your commission in compliance with the legal requirement in the act to regulate commerce that "every common carrier subject to this act shall also file with said commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party." We were advised that the only copy of contract between a trunk-line railroad in the United States and a foreign-flag steamship line on file with your commission was that made by one of the railroads with the Hamburg-American Line some 20 or 25 years ago.

I am advised on what I am convinced is reliable authority that there are many contracts with steamship lines jointly applicable to two or more railroads in this country and that these contracts specifically relate to the development, solicitation, and handling of export and import traffic as between such railroads and the steamship lines.

I trust you will look into this matter at once and that, if the provision of law quoted is not being complied with, your commission compel a compliance by all carriers at once. In this connection, I respectfully suggest also that the railroads be required to furnish your commission with statements of the quantity of traffic delivered to and received from the steamship lines with which the agreements are in effect during the last calendar year. I am very anxious to have all the information the filing of such contracts will afford, and am particularly interested in what the statements of quantity latterly mentioned will bring forth.

Very respectfully, yours,

W. L. JONES.

JUNE 10, 1921.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of May 20 was duly received inquiring what, if any, copies of contracts were filed with us in compliance with the statutory requirement that common carriers subject to the interstate commerce act shall file copies of all contracts, etc., with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected, etc.

Your inquiry had particular reference to contracts between trunk-line railroads in the United States and foreign-flag steamship lines.

A search of our files fails to disclose the presence of contracts of this character. Our annual report forms provide a blank for the abstract of such contracts, if any. Apparently it has not hitherto been customary to call for copies of contracts unless special reference is made thereto in some application. The contracts filed with the Bureau of Traffic refer mainly to trackage arrangements.

The matter being called to the attention of the commission, it was directed that a special statistical series circular be drafted requiring of the carriers the return to our Bureau of Statistics on or before June 30, 1921, copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements, or statements of arrangements not in contract form with steamship companies engaged in foreign commerce affecting transportation of persons or property. The same order to be served on carriers subject to the interstate commerce act will also require a return by August 9, 1921, of a statement of the quantity of traffic for the year 1920 delivered to and received from all steamship lines engaged in foreign commerce, with which contracts or agreements of this nature were in effect at any time during the year 1920.

Yours, very truly,

——— ———, Secretary.

NATIONAL MERCHANT MARINE ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., November 4, 1921.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

In August last you submitted to the Shipping Board a memorandum forwarded to you by "an experienced shipping man tremendously interested in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine." In this it was stated that contracts between American railroad companies and foreign steamship companies were largely responsible for the tying up of Shipping Board vessels for lack of cargo.

A copy of this memorandum was secured from you by the National Merchant Marine Association and its principal features were made public on September 12 last. Since that time representatives of this association have made an examination of such copies of agreements between American railroad companies and steamship companies engaged in the foreign commerce of the United States, as have been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, in accordance with an official order of the commission. I have been asked by the executive committee of this association to report the result of this examination to you.

The following order was issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission under date of June 10, 1921:

"In accordance with an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, dated June 6, 1921, * * * all carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission act are required to file with the commission on or before June 30, 1921, copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with steamship companies engaged in foreign commerce affecting transportation of persons or property. * * * If the carrier addressed has no such contracts, this circular should be returned with a notation to that effect."

There are a number of these contracts and their provisions constitute potentialities that are so grave a menace to the development of the American merchant marine that a searching investigation of them seems not only wise but a vital necessity for the preservation of a volume of American shipping adequate to our needs.

In 1920 alone, according to the roads' own figures, practically 2,000,000 tons of export were turned over to foreign steamship companies by railroads, most of which had contracts with foreign lines.

Large as this amount is, however, it falls far short of representing actual total deliveries of exports by American carriers to our competitors in our own ocean-carrying trade. None of the agreements on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as it has been possible to ascertain, covers transportation to or from the port of New York, and the same is true in regard to other large American ports.

Many of the large railway systems of the United States have executed agreements binding them to give the preference to foreign steamship lines over American lines, and in cases where subsidiaries of the leading roads have executed contracts with foreigners, it is specified that the provisions of the agreement shall apply also to the connections of the road; thus linking up great American systems with development of lines under foreign flags already carrying not far from two-thirds of our ocean commerce.

With the Government turning over many millions of dollars to American railroads, and with the railroads utilizing their resources to secure business for foreign steamship lines, even to the extent of employing solicitors to get cargo, a remarkable situation is created. For, while the Government is forced to tie up hundreds of its vessels for lack of freight, American railroads continue to turn over cargo to foreign steamship lines, and these lines continue to gain steadily in the percentage of our ocean commerce which they carry, while our vessels transport less and less. Thus, the Government, by its payments to the railroads, is using its money to foster competition with its own shipping and thereby add to the heavy burden of loss.

If these contracts can be construed as legal, the fact remains that there has not been found on record with the Interstate Commerce Commission a single agreement whereby an American railroad is pledged to use its efforts to the end of gaining trade for shipping under the American flag.

A list of the foreign steamship lines which benefit by these special arrangements with the great American rail carriers is practically a roster of our chief competitors on the ocean. British lines predominate, but they by no means monopolize the field of favored treatment. Leading Japanese, German, and Scandinavian companies have also been made able to secure in American commerce advantages which are not accorded to our own shipping and which result in the diversion of a volume of freight, which, secured for our own vessels, would greatly diminish the amount of our ships laid up for lack of trade.

In addition to the copies of contracts filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, there are statements, covering the year 1920, of the amount of freight turned over by American railways to shipping companies in foreign commerce, and by these companies to American railways. This mutuality of effort is the inducement offered by the foreign interests. It will be noted, however, by an analysis of the returns that the railroads deliver to the foreign companies more than three tons of freight for every one ton they receive. The following table covers the shipments reported during the year 1920, but only represent ports at which the agreements are stated to have been in effect and does not include New York and other large ports.

	Net tons received.	Net tons delivered.
Pennsylvania System	61,692	234,261
Boston & Albany (New York Central)	60,091	237,073
Baltimore & Ohio	88,113	227,961
Philadelphia & Reading	54,111	233,642
Boston & Maine	211,404	258,061
Grand Trunk	16,839	645,710
Norfolk & Western	174	19,473
Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic	8,064	22,126
Missouri Pacific	1,639	10,476
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul	99,416	110,300
Total	601,543	1,999,083

Among the features in the various agreements filed are these:

Free wharfage and dockage, use of warehouses, etc.

Special piers set aside by railroads for foreign lines.

Exclusive use of facilities without charge.

Reduced rates of freight.

Special demurrage agreements.

Pledges to work together against competitors.

Railroads contract to deliver goods as far as it is in their power to specified foreign lines.

Exemptions agreed to be sought by railroads for foreign lines from port, pilotage, and lighthouse dues and local taxes.

Railroads agree to make every effort within reason to secure amount of freight required by foreign lines.

Coal to be supplied for rates always below the market and never above $5 per ton.

Pledges made to obtain cargoes at rates required by foreign lines.

Railroads not to issue through bills of lading other than by steamers of specified foreign lines.

Preference to be given by railroads to freight tendered by contracting foreign lines over any other freight offered by any other shipper or corporation.

It is not clear that all the agreements filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission are still in effect, although it will be noted that the order of the commission states, "If the carrier addressed has no such contracts, this circular should be returned with a notation to that effect." In this connection attention is called to an agreement executed between the Osaka Shosen Kabushiki Kaisha (Osaka Mercantile Steamship Co. (Ltd.)), and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway. Section 6 of this agreement reads:

"It is further mutually agreed by the parties hereto that all freight tendered to the Osaka Co. by the St. Paul Co. shall be given the preference over any other freight tendered to the Osaka Co. by any other corporation or shipper, the St. Paul Co. advising the agent of the Osaka Co. details of amount of freight contracted for next sailing, and the St. Paul Co. to likewise give the preference to through freight tendered by the Osaka Co. to any other freight tendered to the St. Paul Co. by any other corporation or shipper."

This agreement was executed in 1908, to run until March 1, 1919. A letter signed by R. M. Calkins, vice president of the St. Paul, addressed to the president of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, under date of June 13, 1918, states:

"There is no intention on the part of this company to cancel this contract. In fact, we hope that it may continue in force and that the friendly relations which have been maintained for the past 10 years between our companies will continue indefinitely. Due to the present Federal administration of American railways it is not advisable—and I doubt very much whether it would be possible—for us to enter into a formal renewal of this contract; but, as I have already stated, we trust that it will continue in force, with possibly some slight modification that may be brought about from time to time by the new Government regulations.

"You must understand, however, that at the present time we have no authority to make any pledges or promises, and the situation as I have outlined it is the personal opinion and desires of both our president and the writer, and we sincerely trust that our friendly relations may continue uninterruptedly."

This would indicate, therefore, that there may be cases where written agreements are no longer in force, but where the provisions of those agreements are still being carried on under a mutual understanding.

The other leading Japanese steamship line, the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, has had an agreement with the Great Northern Railroad Co. and the Great Northern Express Co., a part of which pledges the companies to make their best endeavors to secure for the steamship line from port authorities exemption from or reduction in port, pilot, or lighthouse dues, taxes or other charges having reference to both through and local cargo, parcels, and passengers.

Among the other contracts to which attention is called are:

Boston & Albany Railroad (New York Central) with the Cunard Line and the Leyland Line.

Norfolk & Western Railway Co., agreement with Furness, Withy & Co., in connection with Chesapeake & Ohio and Southern Railway Co.

Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., agreements with Johnston Line (Furness, Withy & Co.), Scandinavian-American Line, Donaldson Line, North German Lloyd Line.

Pennsylvania system, agreement with the Northern Central Railway and Furness, Withy & Co.

Pennsylvania system, with the International Mercantile Marine Co. for use of piers.

Missouri Pacific Railway Co., agreements covering demurrage with a number of lines.

Grand Trunk Railway system, free use of various facilities by Cunard Line, White Star-Dominion Line, and Furness, Withy & Co.

Boston & Maine Railroad Co., contracts covering the use of its terminals by various steamship lines.

Southern Railway, agreement with F. D. M. Strachan.

Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Railway Co., agreement with Strachan Shipping Co.

Attention is also called to statements filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission by various railroads, showing the movement of freight in foreign commerce in connection with their lines.

The purpose of the National Merchant Marine Association is not to take up these contracts in detail, but to suggest through the various facts already cited the advisability of Congress investigating the agreements, with a view to ascertaining what can be done to protect the American merchant marine against the operations of combinations of foreign and American shipping, especially in view of the rapidly diminishing share of American trade carried by American vessels, and with only about 350 out of 1,400 of the Shipping Board's steel steamers now in service, a reduction of more than 1,000.

Yours, very truly,

HENRY C. WILTBANK,
Secretary National Merchant Marine Association.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7294) supplemental to the national prohibition act.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WILLIS. Just for a moment, if it is not a matter that will lead to debate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a point of order. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah will state his inquiry.

Mr. KING. Has the morning hour expired?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not, but the hour of 1 o'clock having arrived, the motion is in order.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not care to debate the motion at all.

Mr. WILLIS. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator will withhold his motion for a moment——

Mr. WILLIS. If the Senator can give me assurance that the matter he wishes to call up will not lead to debate or delay, I shall have no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. The only proposition I wish to have called up is that I wish to get a time fixed for consideration of a resolution. If the leader of the majority were in the Senate I could do that in a moment. I talked with him a moment ago, and I thought perhaps he would agree on taking up the resolution which I introduced on September 21.

Mr. WILLIS. We can attend to that subsequently. The leader of the majority is temporarily out of the Chamber.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	Nelson	Smoot
Ball	Heflin	New	Spencer
Borah	Johnson	Newberry	Stanley
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Sutherland
Bursum	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Swanson
Cameron	Kendrick	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Kenyon	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Keyes	Overman	Underwood
Culberson	King	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
du Pont	La Follette	Pittman	Warren
Ernst	Lenroot	Poindexter	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	Lodge	Ransdell	Williams
Fletcher	McCumber	Reed	Willis
Gooding	McKellar	Sheppard
Hale	McNary	Simmons
Harris	Myers	Smith

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the regular order, which is the motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS]. That motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7294) supplemental to the national prohibition act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HARRISON and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. REED. I did not hear the motion which was put because of conversation in the Chamber.

Mr. LODGE. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. REED. I know it is not debatable, but the matter being before the Senate, I was going to suggest that it be temporarily laid aside for, perhaps, an hour. We are trying to carry on some negotiations here, and we can not very well do so while the debate is proceeding.

Mr. ASHURST. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. If the Senator in charge of the bill will have it temporarily laid aside for something like an hour——

Mr. ASHURST. I object.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield for any question.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Arizona may object in his peculiar way, but there is an effort being made here to save some time, and we want a few minutes to consult. A purely arbitrary objection can be interposed by any Senator at any time, but there is not very much sense in that sort of objection. It is not the way to carry on the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS CONFERENCE.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before the motion to take up the conference report made by the Senator from Ohio was acted on I merely wanted to know if we could not have a unanimous-consent agreement to take up a resolution which I offered on September 21 last, which is known as the resolution, providing for publicity at the disarmament conference. The resolution was presented some time ago, and I have not pressed it because the tax bill was before the Senate, but if the resolution is to be passed, it should be passed before the disarmament conference meets on the 12th of this month.

The resolution merely requests our representatives at the conference to use their influence to have the conference admit representatives of the press at the meetings of the full conference. It also provides for the preservation and maintenance of a record of the action and votes of the conference, and provides against any censorship being imposed that would prevent the public from knowing the true attitude of the delegations on the questions which are presented and considered at the conference. It is as conservative as it is possible to draw such a resolution. No one can take offense at it, for we know that we have no control over the conference. The resolution in no way seeks control over it. It merely requests our representatives to use their influence at the conference along the line I have suggested. So I trust there will be no opposition to the resolution. If there is any opposition at the present time, I hope the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will agree that, say, tomorrow, we shall take the resolution up for consideration. It will not provoke a great deal of discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution referred to by him?

Mr. HARRISON. No. I have not asked unanimous consent for its present consideration. I am merely trying to arrive at an agreement to take it up.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I quite agree that the resolution for which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asks consideration is conservatively framed; considering its authorship, I think it is amazingly conservatively framed.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts for the compliment.

Mr. LODGE. But I am bound to say that I think it would be very much out of place for the Senate, especially at this moment, to begin to offer suggestions as to the procedure to be followed by the conference, which must be determined by the nations there represented. I should be very sorry to see the Senate interfere in any way with a matter which must be dealt with by the representatives of the powers whom we have invited here.

I think the Senate may rest assured that the Senator from Alabama and I will favor all the publicity that is reasonably possible for the conference, and certainly that a proper record may be kept; but what I object to is passing any resolution undertaking to suggest to the foreign nations whose delegates shall sit in the conference and who have a right to settle their own procedure in company with us what that procedure shall be. If the resolution is presented, I shall hope that it will not be passed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am very sorry, indeed, to hear the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, because, of course, they carry great weight, especially in this matter. I had hoped that he, having read the resolution, would allow it to be passed, but in view of what he has said I desire to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments to discuss the question.

I expect to call the resolution up for consideration at the earliest possible moment. Senators on each side may take their stand; they may vote against the resolution, if they entertain the same views as those entertained by the Senator from Massachusetts, or they may vote for it if they believe in reasonable publicity at the disarmament conference.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the adoption of the resolution might embarrass the conference, it might be misconstrued by foreign delegations. I can not for the life of me understand how he can imagine that it will embarrass the disarmament conference, or find disfavor among foreign delegations that may be favorable to the call of the conference. It does not ask the conference to do anything; it merely requests our representatives in that conference to use their influence for the admission of the representatives of the press at the full meetings of the full conference. Of course, there will be other meetings which will not be plenary; there will be conferences held of every sort, but at the full conferences, where final views are presented, where action is taken, where votes are recorded, where the success or failure of the conference is determined, the representatives of the press should be admitted.

Mr. President, this side of the Chamber has stood behind the call for the disarmament conference. Every member of the minority, I believe, on every proper occasion has voted to bring about a disarmament conference; there has been no obstacle thrown in its path, and there will be none from this side; indeed, every member of the minority, and I believe every Democrat throughout the country, is heart and soul for the success of the conference.

If there ever was a proposition advanced in this country free from partisanship, it is the disarmament conference. It was only a little while ago that the minority of the Senate met and unanimously passed a resolution wishing for the conference every possible success, and at that time it expressed its gratification that in the selection of representatives the leader on this side of the aisle [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was chosen as one of the four members of the American delegation. Of course, we all have implicit faith and confidence not only in the Senator from Massachusetts, one of the members of the delegation, but in the Senator from Alabama and the other gentlemen making up that delegation.

What is there wrong in the Senate of the United States expressing itself upon such an important question as this? It can not be denied that subtle diplomacy and secretive propaganda is at work here now and will continue to be at work throughout the conference. We know from our experience in executive sessions of the Senate that the true facts never get out, but they are distorted and carried according to the impressions given to the press by the particular person with whom the correspondent talked, and so it will be at the disarmament conference. If its work is clothed in secrecy, certain members of the delegations there will give their impressions to representatives of the press in foreign countries, and there will be a censorship imposed to a greater or less degree and the true facts will be colored and not known by the world. The best way to expedite the work of the conference and make it a success is for every ray of publicity to be thrown upon its proceedings; and the best way to accomplish that is to allow the representatives of the press to attend the meetings of the full conference, in order that they may give their impressions to the readers of the papers they represent throughout the world and that the true facts may be revealed.

The Senator from Massachusetts says he is for publicity. I have observed that the delegation representing this Government has taken action already along certain lines. The first two meetings of the conference, I believe, are to be thrown open to the public. Nothing is said as to the other meetings; but if the Senate of the United States takes action expressing its sentiment on this important matter—namely, requesting our representatives to use their good offices and influence for the admission of the press—it will give their efforts more force and greater influence. It should be most helpful to our representatives in obtaining the largest measure of publicity in the conference, and have great weight with the other delegations in adopting such a plan of procedure.

If the facts discussed and the action taken in this conference are to be known by the world, the only way to secure it is by the admission of the press to the full meetings and by the keeping of a record showing the action and votes of the various delegations at that conference. That is what this resolution requests—nothing more and nothing less. The Senator says we have nothing to do with it. Of course, the Senate can not control the actions of the conference; but I can not imagine how a Senator, even though a great honor has been thrust upon him as one of the representatives of this Government at the conference, should not desire at this time a free and frank expression of the Senate to back him up on this proposition. Of course, we have faith and confidence in our representatives. We simply want to put the force of the expression of the Senate of the United States behind them, so that something real can be accomplished in this matter. If the Senator is sincerely for publicity, he should welcome the adoption of the resolution. If he is against making public the work of the conference, then of course he has a right to oppose it. If the Senator thinks there is bad manners in offering it, then I might suggest impropriety on his part, in the circumstances, to oppose it.

I hope the Senator will not try to place me in the attitude of attempting to embarrass the conference in the slightest way by offering this resolution. I had the honor, in the conference of the minority Senators, to draw and champion the resolution which was adopted, expressing our ardent hope for the greatest measure of success for the conference; and the other day at St. Louis, I may say to the Senator, again I had the honor, in the meeting of the Democratic national committee, to sponsor another resolution expressing hope for the greatest measure of success for the disarmament conference; it was adopted unanimously by the national committee of the Democratic Party. So we want the disarmament conference to succeed. It is our earnest desire and greatest hope that it shall succeed. We will cooperate in every way to make it a success. The best way in the world to assist in its success is to make it possible that the representatives of the press may be at the meetings of the full conference, so that they can gather at first hand the impressions of delegations, and so that if the representatives of any country go against the plans and purposes of the conference not only may their constituents know it but the world may know it, and if the conference is a failure in the end then the fault may be rightfully placed. If the conference is a failure, the Senator, by opposing this resolution, will carry some of the blame for that failure.

It is known and stated every day throughout the world that the failure of the Versailles conference was because of the secrecy that shrouded its deliberations. Senators on the other side and on this side have talked about "open covenants openly arrived at." If we believed in that doctrine, we certainly ought not now to oppose this resolution. It is conservatively drawn. There is not an expression in it that should not meet the indorsement of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. If he simply feels, because this honor has come to him, that he should not listen to the Senate in a free expression on this matter, well and good; but the country is interested in this conference. If it is a failure, they will want to know the reasons why, and they will never know the reasons why if they are secreted behind closed doors and certain matters leak out and are given the color that is desired by the delegates who permit them to leak out. Let the light be thrown on this conference. Let the true facts be known. Let me say again and in conclusion, if the Senator is really for publicity, he ought to covet and desire a free expression of the United States Senate to back him in his efforts to obtain it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is not a question of publicity. We all favor the greatest measure of publicity that is reasonably obtainable. It is not a question of a record. Of course, a record will be made. It is not a question of providing for the press. There are 300 seats reserved for the press at the opening of the conference, and they will have ample opportunity, as ample as possibly can be given.

There is only one objection to the resolution, and to my mind it is a very serious one. I did not wish to put it in this way. It is not a question of the merits of what the resolution asks. We do not disagree about that; but we have invited here some of the great nations of the earth to meet us in conference, with the hope and belief that we can be of some service to the world in the limitation of armaments and in the settlement of the questions of the Far East. They come to that table as our guests, but with precisely the same rights that we have as to the procedure to be followed, and this is purely a question of procedure. For the United States Senate or for the House of Representatives to anticipate the sessions of the conference and undertake to dictate or to suggest to these other nations how they shall carry on their business seems to me not a seemly thing for us to do at this moment. I do not like to use unpleasant words, but it does not seem to me very good manners to meet them in that way. Each one of them has the same rights that we have as to establishing procedure. When we went to Paris, if the French Chamber of Deputies had passed resolutions as to what the procedure should be, I think we, in common with all the other nations who were present at that time, would have considered it very inappropriate and unsuitable, coming from the Chamber of Deputies, and would have felt inclined to resent it. The matter is in the hands of these nations, and each nation has its own vote. Why should we anticipate that they are going to try to shroud it in mystery? Why should we anticipate that they are going to do anything that is objectionable to the terms of the resolution? We have no right to anticipate their action. They are coming into our house, and we ought to receive them with at least the politeness which that situation requires.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. LODGE. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. I have read in the papers that the representatives of the various countries who come here are expecting the procedure to be mapped out by the representatives of the American Government. Is that right?

Mr. LODGE. Why, of course, no procedure will be determined upon until the conference meets.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course; but I have seen it stated that you were mapping out a course of procedure to be submitted to the various members.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the American delegates will very likely make suggestions as to procedure.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and this would be in line with that.

Mr. LODGE. But they will all have precisely the same right.

Mr. HARRISON. We understand that thoroughly.

Mr. LODGE. But the Senate of the United States is not concerned in that.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senate is concerned in that. It is concerned with what its representatives do. I can not understand why the Senator should take offense at that.

Mr. LODGE. I take no offense at it.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. LODGE. I do not object to what is said in the resolution. I am glad, very glad, to have the approval of the Senate, or any suggestions they choose to make to me or to the three delegates with whom I am associated. That is not the question. The question is a simple one of being civil, and treating in what I regard as a proper way the representatives of foreign nations whom we have asked here, and who come here at our request, and who have the same right to speak on this question of procedure that we have.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely; but this will not prevent them from speaking on the matter.

Mr. LODGE. And I do not think it is quite fitting for the Senate or the House or the Congress to undertake indirectly to tell them what they ought to do.

Mr. HARRISON. When the Senator voted for the resolution on Ireland, requesting our delegation at Versailles to use its good offices for Ireland, did he think that was proper?

Mr. LODGE. That is an entirely different thing. That had nothing to do with the procedure of the conference. That was a request that they give a hearing to certain people who were asking for a hearing. If the Senate of the United States should choose to pass a resolution asking that this conference give a hearing on something, I suppose they would have the right to do it if they wanted to; but this is undertaking to tell us how the conference shall be managed and how the procedure shall be carried on. That is all it is.

Mr. HARRISON. The Irish resolution was an expression of the United States Senate requesting our delegates to do certain work.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. This resolution carries with it an expression of the Senate of the United States respectfully requesting its representatives to stand for these things, or to use their good influences for them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I did not wish at this time to discuss this resolution, as I had hoped that it might be set for a time in the very near future when there might be adequate discussion of it. But I do want to say just a word in response to the objection which has been presented by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

He said, as I understood him, that it would be rather bad manners for the Senate to pass the resolution which has been submitted by the Senator from Mississippi. I can not agree with that. The resolution is not framed as I should desire it to be framed, nor does it express as I should desire it to express the wish and necessity for publicity. But I can not concede for one moment that when the Senate respectfully requests the representatives of the United States Government to use their influence in a particular direction, thereby the Senate insults the representatives of France, of Great Britain, or of any other nation which comes to this conference.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say they insulted them.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not say the Senator said we insulted them, but the Senator said it was bad manners.

Mr. LODGE. I think it is.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the Senator's opinion; mine is quite the reverse. If we were guilty of bad manners, doubtless I am entitled to the inference that thereby, by our bad manners, we would be insulting those who come among us.

When did the time arrive that representatives of the United States Government could not be requested by the United States Senate to act in a particular fashion? When did the time come that any man selected to act for the people of the United States could not be respectfully petitioned by the representatives of the people of the United States?

We had no hesitancy in doing it when our representatives were at Paris. We had the right, and we did it. We have the right to-day, and I hope we will do it. I can not see that there is any force in the objection which is urged by our distinguished leader on this side.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator wish to have me yield?

Mr. LODGE. I was just about to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall be glad to answer the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I have no earthly objection to being instructed by the Senate. I should be very glad to have them make any suggestion to me they choose to make. I am speaking of the effect on the people we have asked to come here. I think it would be unfortunate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I respond to that by saying that it is incredible to me that it would be unfortunate, that it would be bad manners, that it would be considered by any foreigner presumptuous if we should suggest respectfully to our representatives a specific or particular course of action. I am utterly unable to follow that reasoning.

Far be it from me, Mr. President, to do aught which might be considered in the slightest degree offensive to any of those who come here to this conference. Far be it from me to do anything which might be considered by our representatives in the slightest degree offensive to them. The Senator from Massachusetts says he has no personal objection to a resolution of this sort, but bases his opposition solely upon the effect it might have upon foreign nations. If, therefore, the Senate concludes that there could be no bad effect upon foreign nations, we have, then, really his advocacy of the resolution that is presented.

Now, just a word as to the other question. There is one armor which the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Alabama, and the other American delegates to this conference will have. There is an armor in the matter of this world conference that will be invulnerable in the days to come. That armor is publicity. I do not need to advert to what has transpired in the past.

The Senator from Massachusetts asks us, and asks us well, Why anticipate? I do not care to anticipate or to prophesy, but we have had our lesson in the last few years. We know what transpired in the meetings of the nations which were held abroad. We know that the President went to Paris with the very highest intentions and the most idealistic aspirations. We know that he failed, from the standpoint of those whose views are such as mine, not because his intentions were not good, but because he was locked in a room in secrecy over there, and his idealism finally was broken and destroyed and secrecy rendered nugatory every good intention that he had.

That is experience. I would not for one instant suggest that any man comes to the disarmament conference from abroad with any other idea than that which we have; but we want—the people of the United States want—limitation of armaments; they want success of this great gathering that is to meet in Washington within a few days.

How will we obtain it? I have for the leader on this side and the leader on the other side not only respect but the highest admiration; but I say to them, you will not obtain success by locking the door and keeping from the people of this and other lands what you are doing. You will witness with publicity the peoples of all the world behind you praying, fighting, advocating disarmament; but if you shut the door and divest yourselves of this one great weapon, just that instant you are powerless; just that instant you come upon the peril which the President came upon at Paris; and just that instant you endanger that which all the world desires. I beg and I plead with the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Alabama, when you go into that conference, go there not alone the delegates of the United States, but go there representing the hopes, the aspirations, the prayers of peoples of all the world, peoples who desire disarmament, though rulers may not. Let peoples operate upon that conference, and they can operate in just one way, by publicity, and publicity will enable an overwhelming righteous public sentiment of the peoples of the world to compel delegates there to do the peoples' will.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think I may say without impropriety that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and I—and it is a great pleasure to me to think that we are in entire accord—are very strongly in favor of limitation of armaments. I can not put it as eloquently as does the Senator from California, but we feel just as earnestly about it. We are anxious to bring it about. Also we have seen the importance of publicity to the cause we have at heart. I think I might say that we realize very full that success, as we look at it—the success we wish to obtain—depends in the greatest possible measure on the opinion not merely of the United States but of the world. We believe that the support of public opinion of the world in what we are hoping and going to try to do is, as the Senator from California says, the best weapon we have.

Is it necessary, however, that we should begin by intimating in the Senate of the United States that the other nations whom we have asked to meet us here are going to try to smother everything in secrecy? In meeting the representatives of the other nations who come here I prefer to consider that, for the time at least, and before one step has been taken or one word said, they, too, are anxious for the limitation of armaments; that they, too, seek to promote the peace of the world; that they, too, desire the settlement of the questions of the Far East; and that they will be anxious also to have the greatest publicity, so that they may receive the support of public opinion.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care to meet them at the threshold with a Senate resolution, which, however it is worded, intimates indirectly that we doubt whether they are going to desire publicity, that we suspect that they wish to conduct the conferences in holes and corners and behind curtains. I think the proper way to proceed is to assume that the representatives of other nations will take the same view that we do, and that when we come to settle the necessary procedure of the conference they will settle it as we shall wish to settle it. I do not wish to anticipate, and I am sorry, for that reason, that this debate has occurred. This resolution implies that the delegates of the United States need instructions to do their obvious duty, in order to make the representatives of the other nations do the same thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not understand that this resolution is to go to anybody except our representatives.

Mr. LODGE. It would go to the world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator spoke of meeting these people with the Senate resolution. This resolution is never to be communicated to them at all. It is only to our representatives.

Mr. LODGE. It would be communicated to the whole world.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand, but it would not be a request we would make of them; it would be a request which we would make of our representatives.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; we would make it of our representatives, and it would be a gentle hint to them that they ought to behave themselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think the Senate has any more right to pass such a resolution than any other equal body of citizens.

Mr. LODGE. Neither do I.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think any hundred men in the United States would have a perfect right to draw up a petition and ask our representatives to use their influence for publicity, or for anything else they thought ought to be done.

Mr. LODGE. But a solemn resolution of the Senate, I think, has rather more meaning than that of citizens who do not have any official responsibility.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think so, too, and in the past I have sometimes deprecated and regretted some solemn resolutions of the Senate concerning things which the Senate has nothing in the world to do with, for example, the independence of Ireland. The House of Commons might as well have passed a resolution for the independence of the Philippines. Still, it is no more an interference with these people, or bad manners toward them, than would be a petition of a hundred people, or the passage of a resolution by a peace congress, or any other body. Does not the Senator think that, no matter in what room that conference is held, there will be some back stairs to that room, and that some of those back stairs will be trodden by people who have interests which militate against disarmament and world peace, and that it will be very well to let the whole world know that they were there, if they dare come? I do not think they would dare come in if there were publicity.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know at all to whom the Senator refers; but people of any sort who wish to communicate with the representatives of the United States or other members of the conference will have no difficulty in doing it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will admit there are influences in this world that have an interest against disarmament.

Mr. LODGE. I am always told so by the Democratic Party when they are talking about armor plate manufacturers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator will admit that as a matter of fact. I do not think anybody will deny it. The only way they can make themselves felt is through secrecy.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely desire, since the morning hour has expired, to say that I expect to call up this resolution at the very first opportunity.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, there has been for many weeks and months a persistent rumor that a few men desiring to serve a few brewers without regard to the merits of the case were obstructing legislation. Of course that rumor was utterly without foundation in fact. Few in the Senate were deceived by it or affected by it.

The truth is, Mr. President, that patriotic men, men whose motives, whose devotion to duty I do not doubt or question, believe—how they can I do not see; nevertheless they sincerely believe—that the pending legislation is consonant with the Constitution and beneficial to those who will be affected by it.

On the other hand, Mr. President, are men not less philanthropic, not less friendly to real temperance, who do believe that the measure is obviously and flagrantly in contravention of the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States. Those Senators have sworn to protect and defend and preserve that sacred instrument. They are just as firmly of the opinion that the liberties of the citizen, constitutional guaranties as sacred to free man as life itself, are violated by this same proposed legislation. For that reason both sides have regarded it as of the utmost importance that the moral question upon the one side and the constitutional question upon the other should be fully and thoroughly discussed in order that not only this body might understand, but the electorate, the master of us all, might thoroughly apprehend the vital and basic differences between us.

I do not and have not attempted a filibuster. There is no argument in mere obstruction. Right or wrong, as a Democrat, I am a believer in the sanctity of the Constitution and in the aphorism of Thomas Jefferson, that the will of the majority or the force of revolution must decide every question in the Republic. I am more than willing that at the proper time this question may be settled by a majority of this body. I hope some agreement for a final determination of this matter may be reached after full and fair discussion of this vitally important question.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, in harmony with the suggestion so eloquently made just now by the Senator from Kentucky, I am about to submit a request for unanimous consent to fix a date on which we may vote upon the conference report. The matter has been pretty generally discussed, and there have been conferences among Senators on both sides of the aisle. I submit the request, which I ask may be read before I call for a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on the calendar day of Friday, November 18, 1921, the Senate will convene at 11 o'clock a. m., and that at the hour of 12 o'clock meridian on said calendar day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the question of agreeing to the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 7294) "An act supplemental to the national prohibition act."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, may we have it read again? There was so much confusion in the Chamber we could not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be again read.

The reading clerk again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Ball	Harrison	Moses	Spencer
Borah	Heflin	Nelson	Stanley
Broussard	Johnson	New	Sutherland
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Swanson
Capper	Kendrick	Nicholson	Townsend
Caraway	Kenyon	Oddie	Trammell
Culberson	Keyes	Overman	Underwood
Cummins	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Ladd	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
du Pont	La Follette	Poindexter	Warren
Ernst	Lenroot	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Williams
Gooding	McKellar	Shortridge	Willis.
Hale	McKinley	Smith

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair have the proposed unanimous-consent agreement again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on the calendar day of Friday, November 18, 1921, the Senate will convene at 11 o'clock a. m., and that at the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the question of agreeing to conference report upon the bill H. R. 7294, "An act supplemental to the national prohibition act."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? There being no objection, the agreement is entered into.

CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to call up Senate resolution 144.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 144.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am making that request, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who, I understand, desires to call up another matter, because I understand that with a change of the resolution which I propose to try to effect the resolution will not be opposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and he will have no objection to its being adopted. The resolution, which was discussed somewhat this morning, pertains to publicity at the disarmament conference. If I may have unanimous consent to call up the resolution for consideration now, I shall move the amendment to which I refer to cure the objection which has been made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can not change my opinion as to the resolution referred to by the Senator from Mississippi, that it is a mistake to adopt any such resolution, but if the last clause of the resolution is stricken out, which I think is very objectionable, I shall not make further resistance to it, if it is not going to lead to debate; but I do not care to have the resolution taken up now and debated any further. If we may have a vote at once, I have no objection to its present consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to say that I do not know of any discussion there will be on the resolution if it may be amended as I suggest.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire that the resolution shall be taken up to interfere with the emergency tariff bill, which ought to be disposed of at once.

Mr. WILLIS. Merely in order to keep the record straight, I desire to say that I understand the conference report on the prohibition bill is still before the Senate as the unfinished business. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has asked unanimous consent to take up and consider Senate resolution No. 144. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I object to that. That would not be in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. WILLIS. I repeat, the conference report is technically before the Senate, and I have requested that it be temporarily laid aside. After that is done the Senator from Mississippi may proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the conference report on the prohibition bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report on the prohibition bill is before the Senate, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CUMMINS. When did it come before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. It came before the Senate on motion by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. CUMMINS. I was present, but I did not hear the motion made.

Mr. WILLIS. I made the motion; it was put by the Chair and was carried. The conference report has been laid before the Senate as the unfinished business; but, in order to keep the record straight, I now ask, since the unanimous-consent agreement has been entered into, that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then every bill that is brought before the Senate hereafter is at the mercy of the beer bill, and any Senator who cares to object to laying it aside may thereby prevent the consideration of any other measure.

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the Senator that I think there will be no difficulty about that because Senators have agreed on both sides of the Chamber on a time for voting. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. But what I have suggested is true.

Mr. WILLIS. I, too, think it is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not understand that the Senator from Ohio brought before the Senate anything but the request for a unanimous-consent agreement. I had no objection to that; but if I had known that he had brought the conference report before the Senate on motion, so as to make it the unfinished business of the Senate, I should have objected to the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not believe that it is quite the right thing that every measure that is to follow and that is to be considered before the day appointed for the vote upon the prohibition bill shall be at the mercy of that measure, for, of course, any Senator who is opposed to the bringing forward of any other legislation will object to laying aside the prohibition bill, and we shall be in deadlock.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask the Chair to put my request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair is advised, the conference report on the prohibition bill is not the unfinished business; therefore the request to lay it aside is out of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was about to move to take up the emergency tariff bill, but I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] desires consideration for a resolution which will provoke no debate, and which it has been practically agreed may be acted upon without any further discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that be true, I shall be very glad to have the resolution disposed of.

Mr. HARRISON. I have submitted a request for unanimous consent that the resolution be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi requests unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 144. Is there objection?

Mr. LODGE. Before unanimous consent is given for the consideration of the resolution, I merely wish to repeat that I am sorry the resolution has been presented for consideration; but the first two clauses of the resolution constitute merely a request which is addressed to the delegates of the United States, and, rather than continue the debate upon the resolution, if the last clause is stricken out, I shall make no further objection to the resolution with the understanding that it may be voted on at once.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is the understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that is the understanding.

Mr. LODGE. Then the last clause of the resolution is to be stricken out?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Has my request for unanimous consent been granted, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Mississippi for the present consideration of Senate resolution 144 is granted.

Mr. SPENCER. May we have the resolution read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States wishes every success for the conference on limitation of armaments called by President Harding to meet in the city of Washington on the 11th day of November, 1921; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States believes that the greatest publicity to which, in reason, consideration of the questions for which the conference is called will admit will tend toward the success of the conference: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States respectfully requests the representatives of the Government of the United States at the conference to use their influence to have the conference admit representatives of the press to the meetings of the full conference where the questions for which the conference was called are considered.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States respectfully requests the representatives of the Government of the United States at the conference to use their influence to have the conference maintain and preserve a record containing the proceedings of the conference when the matters for which the conference was called are considered and acted upon.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States respectfully requests the representatives of the Government of the United States at the conference to use their influence against any form of censorship upon the part of the conference that will prevent the public from being informed through the press of the correct attitude of delegations and nations touching the questions considered in the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the resolution which has just been read is before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I now move to strike out the last clause of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, beginning in line 8, it is proposed to strike out the last clause of the resolution as follows:

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States respectfully requests the representatives of the Government of the United States at the conference to use their influence against any form of censorship upon the part of the conference that will prevent the public from being informed through the press of the correct attitude of delgeations and nations touching the questions considered in the conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF EMERGENCY TARIFF.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8643) to extend the tariff act approved May 27, 1921, known as the emergency tariff bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, the import of this bill is such that I think some of those who may be out of the Chamber temporarily should be called before the motion is put. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Heflin	New	Spencer
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Stanley
Bursum	Kendrick	Nicholson	Sutherland
Capper	Kenyon	Oddie	Swanson
Caraway	Keyes	Page	Townsend
Culberson	King	Phipps	Trammell
Cummins	Ladd	Pittman	Underwood
Curtis	Lenroot	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	Lodge	Reed	Warren
Fernald	McCumber	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	McKellar	Shields	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McKinley	Shortridge	Willis
Hale	McNary	Simmons
Harris	Moses	Smith
Harrison	Nelson	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. KING. What is the motion of the Senator from North Dakota?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8643) to extend the tariff act approved May 27, 1921.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is it the intention of the Senator to proceed with the consideration of the bill during the day?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; that is the purpose. The present emergency tariff law expires by its terms on the 27th day of this month. Other measures will be pressing before the Senate for consideration. There is the railroad bill, the beer bill, the refunding bill, and other important bills; and I wanted to get the emergency tariff bill disposed of, if possible, before any recess, and certainly to have the question determined before the present law can possibly expire by limitation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this measure is important and involves matters which are more or less vital, I have no doubt, to those who regard the legislation as necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, is it proposed by the Senator to take up this bill for consideration now?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is my desire.

Mr. KING. I would have no objection, speaking for myself, to having it taken up, if the Senator will not ask for a vote until to-morrow; but I should like some little chance to study the bill, not with a view of engaging in any prolonged discussion, for I may not feel constrained to say anything at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would there be any objection to a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on it to-morrow at any time the Senator may suggest?

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I suggest to my colleague that there is not a change in this bill from the existing emergency tariff bill. I recognize that this will extend the dye embargo. My colleague is not any more opposed to a permanent dye embargo than I am. I shall never, with my vote, agree to it; but as long as there is no protection under the existing law, which we will all admit is not sufficient, I am perfectly willing, and I ask my colleague to vote for the embargo until we can get the regular tariff bill out.

For months past I have been studying the question of German manufactures of dyes all over the United States. I have collected the prices of to-day in Germany, in Switzerland, in England, and in other countries of the world, together with the prices of the American productions, and I am quite certain, no matter what the outside may say or what the dye people may say, that we can protect that industry without imposing an embargo, and I shall not vote for a permanent embargo at any time. If it were left to me now, I should say that this was the proper thing to do under the existing conditions.

I simply wanted to state that, and to assure my colleague that that is the feeling I have, and I am quite sure that is the feeling of the Senate from all the information that I can gather. This bill simply extends the life of the present emergency tariff law. I do not know whether the Senator from North Dakota has offered an amendment to it or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not as yet, but I desire to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion to the Senator. We were here last night until 2 o'clock. I think every Senator who was here—and most of us were here—is jaded this afternoon. We have been through a long siege on a very important bill. This is a very important bill. It deserves the very careful attention of the Senate. There is no desire upon the part of anybody to postpone it in any way; but after it is laid before the Senate this afternoon, I think we ought to let it go over until the morning, until we can get in a physical condition to go over the matter carefully, and I hope the Senator will let it take that course.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if there is any bill that has been presented to the Congress during the past few years that has been thoroughly discussed and thrashed out, it is this so-called emergency tariff measure. When it was first introduced the discussion was very, very thorough. When it was extended, after being in operation three months, I think, it was again discussed. Both discussions traveled over practically the same ground. This, I believe, is the second time that an extension has been asked. So far as I know, nothing new affecting this measure has transpired since the last extension. We have had it now for nearly six months.

When it was first passed the country was very much interested in it and its effect. A large class of taxpayers in the country honestly believed that it was going to be very helpful to them. They had been promised, as the result of its passage, a speedy increase in the low prices to which agricultural products had been descending, and they believed they would get it. Of course, we all know that their expectations have not been realized, and what little interest there was in the country as a whole in this measure has long since subsided, and I think now there is not anywhere in the United States any feeling of concern about it or interest in it one way or the other; yet there are some things embraced in it—dyestuffs and perhaps sugar—which can not be placed in the same category as the common run of agricultural products. Dyestuffs, of course, are not agricultural products at all. Sugar differentiates itself in very many vital ways from other agricultural products of this country so far as the tariff is concerned. Undoubtedly a tariff on sugar will be to the advantage of the sugar producers of this country; no one has ever questioned that; but I doubt very much whether there are many other agricultural products produced in this country which would be materially helped by a tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. Wool.

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly, wool. In the case of wool, as in the case of sugar, we do not produce more than half as much as we consume in the United States, and therefore a tariff duty does have, in those instances, some effect upon the price. There are a few items of that sort in the bill because of which those who are interested in their production still feel an interest in this bill; but the producers of most of the items that are mentioned in it now are, I think, thoroughly disillusioned. They expect nothing further from it, and care nothing further about it. However that may be—and I do not wish to enter into that sort of discussion or controversy here; I want it understood that I am not saying this in a controversial spirit—however that may be, all the questions, economic, financial, and political, that are involved in this measure have been thoroughly thrashed out. I think we became tired of this bill when we had it up here the second time. I do not want to go through that dreary performance again. These tariff discussions are at best uninteresting, and when a subject has been sufficiently discussed I do not myself believe that any good purpose is served by repetition.

I am making these preliminary remarks, Mr. President, after conference with the minority members of the Finance Committee this morning. I have had no opportunity to confer with them except hastily, not knowing until a few minutes ago that the bill would be thrust upon the Senate this morning. I understand that the majority members themselves probably did not expect it to come up to-day—but as soon as I ascertained that it had been brought up, I hurriedly conferred with reference to it with such of the members of the minority of the Finance Committee as were in the Chamber and could be reached, and we have agreed that there is no good reason why we should not permit this bill to be acted upon at once. It is understood that this so-called emergency tariff is to be extended until the tariff law now in process of being framed is passed. I rather like the provision in the bill extending it to a definite time. February 1, I believe, is named.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not the whole of it, but certain parts of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but while I like February, I would not object if it were March or April. I understand, however, that the majority members of the committee desire to strike that provision out altogether——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just to strike out the words fixing the date and have it run until otherwise provided by law. That will be the permanent tariff bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. In other words, you wish to extend it until the permanent tariff bill is enacted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; so that we will not have to ask for another extension.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think that is a very material matter, because if we were to extend it to a definite time, as we did before, and the majority party, with their usual sluggishness in matters of tariff and revenue legislation, should fail by that time to bring in and pass a tariff bill, they would be here knocking at the door and asking for another extension, and, of course, we would have to give it to them. So I do not think the fact is material that it is not to be extended to a definite date and the extension to be until a permanent tariff measure is enacted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator, may I suggest that it is my understanding that the minority Members, while favoring action on the bill and opposing any delay in regard to it, are not committed to favoring the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, certainly not; certainly not. I thought that went without saying. We are just as much opposed to the bill now as we were when it was originally enacted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. More so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; more so, because there are greater reasons. What we then predicted has since transpired. What we then thought would happen has happened. There has been demonstration of the soundness of our position with reference to it, so we believe.

Mr. President, while I do not desire to foreclose any discussion in which any Member on this side of the Chamber or the other side may wish to engage, so far as the minority members of the committee are concerned we are willing that a vote may be taken whenever there is nobody who desires further to discuss it. So far as I am concerned, as the ranking member of the minority—and I think I can speak for the other members of the minority—we have no disposition to discuss it and shall not discuss it. Therefore, while I would not agree to a vote at this moment if there should be any Senator who wishes to speak, if no one desires to speak I have no objection to a vote now.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I want to say only a word in support of the position taken by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

It seems to me that this is no time to interfere with business conditions in this country by another tariff change prior to the enactment of the general tariff bill in a few months. To prevent the extension of the time of the so-called emergency tariff law as sought for in this bill, or to open up the question for agitation at this time would not, in my opinion, contribute to the restoration of prosperity. So, regardless of the merits of the question, or whether this was originally a wise piece of legislation, it seems to me the only sound and sensible thing to do is to grant this extension. The Senator from North Carolina has very properly and ably presented the views of the minority in stating that, regardless of our views upon the merits of the original law, which, of course, were hostile, and regardless of our firm belief that it has not worked out to the advantage of those it was intended to help, we still think that the extension should be granted, in the interest of business, and in the interest of preventing any further disturbance of the unsettled conditions among the agricultural interests of the country. Therefore, I hope the minority will not delay this extension bill, but wait until the general tariff bill is presented to make known our opposition to the highly special and most unfortunate tariff provisions of the emergency tariff law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to proceed to the immediate consideration of House bill 8643, the emergency tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we all agree that we do not want to be compelled to bring this matter up again if we are unable to get a tariff bill passed before the 1st day of February, a matter about which I have some doubts. Whether for the reasons suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, the usual sluggishness of this side of the Chamber, or the usual obstructiveness of the other side of the Chamber, the result would be practically the same; so it might be necessary for us to bring it up again. Therefore I move to amend by striking out the words, on line 10, "until February 1, 1922," so that it will read, "shall continue in force unless otherwise provided by law."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not intend to take any exception to what the Senator has said about the obstructiveness of this side of the Chamber because he smiled when he said it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should be better suited if the Senator from North Dakota would fix some limitation in the bill. Any party, whether the Republican Party or the Democratic Party, would have the utmost difficulty in framing a tariff measure now, in view of the violent fluctuations of exchange and in view of the unstable conditions in Europe to-day. With the mark selling for less than 1 cent——

Mr. SMOOT. They are selling three for a cent.

Mr. KING. With all European money greatly depreciated, and the depreciation continuing, in some countries at least, it seems to me impossible for any party—I do not care what their motives might be, or how desirous they might be to prepare a wise, scientific, and proper tariff measure measured either by Democratic standards or by Republican standards—to formulate a tariff bill which would be satisfactory to those who seek just and rational legislation.

Speaking as a friend of the Republican Party, I think it will make a great blunder if attempts are made to pass a tariff bill in the present condition of foreign exchange. In my opinion, that condition will not be remedied for many months.

I do not believe there will be a tariff bill enacted until the coming summer or possibly later. Possibly our Republican friends may be constrained to wait until another year, at which time, of course, the House will be Democratic, and then they will fail to enact a Republican tariff bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I hardly believe that, as pessimistic as we may be, we will look for any such calamity.

Mr. KING. I would regard the continuance of the Underwood-Simmons law as a blessing to the American people; secondly, it would be a very great blessing to the American people if the next House were Democratic.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I suggest, as long as it is proposed to amend the House bill at all, that the word "until" be used instead of the word "unless," in the last line of the pending bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that is a good suggestion, and I accept it as a part of the amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. So that it will read, not "unless otherwise provided by law" but "until otherwise provided"—that is, until you pass some permanent legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will include that in my motion to amend.

Mr. KING. How does the Senator now propose to amend the bill before us?

Mr. McCUMBER. It will be the bill as it came to us, except that we will strike out the language "until February 1, 1922, unless" and insert in lieu of the word "unless" the word "until," so that it will read "so as to continue in force until otherwise provided by law."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would much prefer to have the Senator make his amendment read "until March 1" or "until April 1," as suggested, because, as I said, in my opinion there may be no tariff bill next year, or if one is enacted it will probably be during midsummer.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am certain that there will be an earnest attempt to have one passed as early as possible during the winter months; but realizing how difficult it is to adjust these matters in the present condition of the world, I fully realize how it may take longer than we now anticipate, just as the passage of the revenue bill has taken a great deal longer than we thought it would at the time it was introduced. I hope we can put this through. I know how the Senator feels with reference to the dye proposition, and I think the expressions which have been made by the senior Senator from Utah are joined in by a good many members of the Finance Committee, and inasmuch as the Senator can, by a speech on any bill, give vent to his sentiments concerning the dye question, and as I do not believe it would change the vote upon this bill, I ask that we may have a vote now upon the emergency tariff bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from North Dakota whether there were any hearings before the Finance Committee of the Senate in behalf of the measure which is now under consideration?

Mr. McCUMBER. It would do the Senator's heart good, if he were a supporter of the bill, if he could have heard the testimony which we took the other day and to-day before the Finance Committee on the actual saving of the sheep business in the Western States by reason of the emergency tariff bill. I do not intend to go into this or enter upon a discussion of the merits or demerits at this time, because they have been argued over and over so often that I conceive nothing would be gained by it.

We have taken no further testimony, of course, upon the dye bill. We have the agricultural schedule now before the Committee on Finance, and we go over all of these subjects and will undoubtedly be able to make a complete report as to the effect of the emergency tariff bill, if any, upon this particular production. If it has not done any good in bringing about higher prices, of course it has done no harm in bringing about higher prices.

Mr. KING. If it were not discourteous I might say that my good friend the Senator from North Dakota has imitated in the answer just made our tonsorial friend, whose fame is known to all Senators. He has become celebrated because of the dexterous manner in which he evades questions propounded to him by Senators.

My friend, the acting chairman of the committee, has become dexterous in evading answers to questions submitted. Of course, he does it unintentionally and no doubt believes he is frankly and fully replying. If I can interpret the words of my friend correctly there have been no hearings upon this bill, but hearings being held are upon the general tariff bill. That, I suppose, is what the Senator means.

Mr. McCUMBER. During the last two days we have considered the woolen schedule, and agriculture, of course, takes in both sheep and wool. That is affected by this bill. Therefore, the evidence which we took bore directly upon that industry and the effect of the emergency tariff in sustaining that industry in the West. I could not make it more clear, because I know all the testimony we have taken thus far does so.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the bill is voted upon, permit me to say I regret very much that the Finance Committee has presented this report. I have said enough heretofore to indicate that I have had no faith whatever in the provisions of this bill as they apply to such farm products as wheat and corn.

It has been a sort of a sop to Cerberus, perhaps, but if any farmer has received any benefit from this tariff on wheat or the tariff on corn, I have not seen him anywhere; and when the papers are filled with statements to the effect that farmers in the West are going to burn corn instead of coal this winter, and we have a yield of perhaps 3,000,000,000 bushels or more, more corn than is produced in all the rest of the world together, and it has become so cheap that it is converted from a food product into a fuel product, I do not understand why we should seek to continue a duty of 15 cents a bushel on corn. I realize that my good friend from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] does not agree with me upon that subject. I know that whatever may be done here, this bill is going to pass. I can simply express my dissatisfaction with its provisions.

But it is not so much the agricultural schedule to which I am opposed as the embargo on dyes. If there is one word in the English language that is hated by America, it is the word "embargo," and particularly in time of peace. My mail is flooded with the result of well-defined propaganda in favor of this legislation. The dye makers have gotten control of chemists, at least persuasively so, and chemists have come to the conclusion that they are not able to do anything in this country without an embargo.

I do not know what the source of the chemists' inspiration is. I have in my possession a very interesting letter, which I had intended to introduce in the RECORD. I had no idea that this bill was to be called up to-day and I do not have the letter with me.

In my judgment it is little short of a crime to place the woolen, the cotton, the silk, and the paint industries of this country in a position where they must buy all of their supplies in this country. I wish they could get them all here. I know that many of the dyes which are produced in this country are the equivalent in quality of the dyes that are produced elsewhere, but I know at the same time that many of those dyes are not good; nevertheless the dye makers, from a standpoint of pure, unadulterated selfishness, nothing more or nothing less, would place all of those great industries entirely at the mercy of themselves. They are so eager about it. Admitting that there is a German dye trust, as we all know and believe there is, I do not think it makes very much difference to the American woolen, cotten, silk, and paint men of the country whether they are to be dominated by a German dye trust or an American dye trust.

Mr. President, I recognize the fact that during the war we adopted a dye tariff and that the schedule was very high. It has been common information that it was the dye makers who prepared, or at least proposed, the schedule of rates. I do not forget that when this legislation passed the Congress of the United States it was defended not alone on the theory of a protective tariff but because the Government was interested in the manufacture of explosives as a means of defense.

I have no desire to do anything that is going to jeopardize these particular interests or any of them. I do not think they are in danger of destruction by competition from abroad. They profess to be in great fear, but I do not forget that before we entered the war, as well as during the war and since, these dye manufacturers urged the Congress to advance duties or place an embargo upon their importation, declaring that there were great shiploads of dyes ready to come to our ports here immediately after the armistice was signed.

Well, Mr. President, we know there was nothing in those statements. We know, too, that during the past year, while only about $5,000,000 worth of dyes were brought into this country, nearly $30,000,000 worth were shipped out of this country. Of course, while German dyes were not brought into this country because of the embargo, American dyes were shipped abroad and were sold in other countries where German dyes were sold.

Mr. H. W. Harris, a member of the Alliance, Ohio, bar, has been in the Consular Service for 25 years or more. He entered the service by appointment of President McKinley. I have known him all my professional life. He was one of the best qualified and most efficient men in the service. He is not a Democrat with a Democrat's views on the tariff. He is a Republican who is inoculated with the policy of high protection. For years he served his country faithfully and well as its consul and later as consul general in Germany. A part of this period he was in the same city in which the great dye plant that was blown up some days ago was located. He was one of the consular officers who did not regard his position as a mere sinecure but a man who studied trade conditions over there for the benefit of American commerce. He was transferred from one place to another and later was made consul general at Habana, Cuba, where he had an opportunity to study trade conditions in Cuba and in the South American Republics. As a result of the abundance of his experience and observations in these various places he became fully acquainted with the dye industry. He wrote me when he found the campaign was afoot to continue this embargo. In substance this is his statement with regard to the matter:

He said that all the time he was in Habana the merchants and the buyers sought foreign goods, European goods, in preference to American goods, because of the better and faster colors, and that by reason of their experiences with American woven goods they were driven out of the market. That was the common observation. In his letter he says, in substance, nothing would be more pleasing to the manufacturers of cloth in the Old World than to have the American Congress continue this embargo on foreign dyes. Just now when we are seeking to extend our commerce to the four corners of the earth we have this campaign afoot to give a monopoly to our American dye manufacturers, and thereby cripple the cotton, woolen, silk, and paint industries of the country.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that whether we look at the tariff question from the Democratic standpoint or the Republican standpoint, no defense of the embargo can be made before the American people.

Mr. President, I sent for my files and I am going to read one or two of the letters to which I have referred.

Bear in mind, these letters are from a Republican, a protective-tariff, consular officer. Let me say further, with regard to Mr. Harris, he did not leave the service because of any inefficiency or anything of that kind. He was retained during the McKinley administration, the Roosevelt administration, the Taft administration, and the two Wilson administrations until the latter days thereof, when he resigned because of ill health.

His letter is dated Alliance, Ohio, October 5, 1921, and addressed to myself. It reads as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR: In view of our long personal acquaintance and my knowledge of your desire to do those things only which will be for the general good, I have thought it not improper to write you in the matter of dyestuff products, the importation of which to the United States it is now proposed to prohibit or render all but impossible.

As a consular officer I was for about 15 years in Germany, the first 6½ years being at Mannheim, which is directly across the Rhine from Ludwigshafen, where the very large works of the Badische anilin and soda fabrik are located. This concern was the largest of its kind in the world, employing about 9,000 men, including from 180 to 200 skilled chemists, mostly graduates of the large technical schools in various parts of Europe. Employees of this concern took out many American patents, and I came much in contact with the industry while at Mannheim and later as consul general at Frankfort, also a great center of this branch of manufacture.

The industry was, as you will recall, originally a British industry, which was later entered upon by the Germans as well as by the French, though on a lesser scale, and vastly improved upon under the higher standards of technical training on the Continent, which went very far in other somewhat similar industries requiring technical training such as those of tanning, medical preparations of which the United States was a large importer, artificial fertilizers, etc.

In the dyestuff industry the durability or fastness of colors, their brilliancy, the various shades, the cost of production, and other important questions arise. As we all know, new shades of various fabrics are being placed upon the market from season to season. In all markets much stress is placed upon colors and their fitness to meet climatic and other conditions. I heard very much of this problem during two and a half years in Habana, Cuba, after our entering the war. I believe experience will show that for some years to come American dyes will not meet the demands likely to be made upon them by our textile and other industries, and that it will be a grave mistake to bar foreign dyes or to force our textile industries to use dyes in any degree inferior to those used by similar European or other industries. It seems to me the question is one that affects not only our textile industries but all our people into the homes of which the matter of shades and colors enter far more than some of us may have thought to be the case.

There is not the slightest doubt that European textiles are just now being pushed upon Cuban and other Western Hemisphere markets under guarantees as to new shades, durability of colors under climatic and other conditions that exist in these markets, that our dyestuff industries are not yet able to meet. That they will later be able to compete in quality as well as in price with European dyestuffs all of us will hope may be the case. We may take it for granted that European manufacturers will be after the world's trade as perhaps never before, and that the fullest possible use will be made of any defect in the materials we use, however slight that defect may be. With some knowledge of European and other foreign trade, I have no doubt whatever that the great textile industries of Europe and of the east would be very glad to learn of any legislation which may tend to put our textile industries at a disadvantage in the markets.

You will understand that I have not any personal interest in the dyestuff industry. I write you only because I believe that proposed legislation on the subject is likely to have unfortunate effects upon our own industries at a time when they should be as unhampered as possible and thereby take their place in the world's trade.

Very sincerely, yours,

H. W. HARRIS.

Then he adds a postscript, as follows:

P. S.—That the dyestuff industries went over to war materials during the war to a considerable extent in some cases is probably true. We know the same was true of many industries in all parts of the world, including some in this, our home country.

H. W. H.

Mr. President, I have not read that letter without Mr. Harris's permission. I wrote him asking his consent to use the letter. I think I will ask to insert my letter to him at this point without reading it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD:

The letter referred to is as follows:

OCTOBER 8, 1921.

Hon. H. W. HARRIS, Alliance, Ohio.

MY DEAR HARRIS: Thank you for your favor of the 5th instant, with reference to dyestuffs products.

The views you have expressed lead you to the same conclusion I have reached. You have had the advantage, however, of personal observation of the dye industry in Germany, supplemented by your experience in Cuba.

In addition to the reasons which you give against the embargo, I think it perfectly clear that if all foreign dyes were excluded there would be the same disposition to so organize the American dye industries as to make the prices to suit themselves and place every user of dyes completely at their mercy.

Again, the present duties on dyes are very high. The schedule was prepared, as I am advised, by the American manufacturers themselves. Of course there has been a radical decline in the value of foreign exchange, but I do not think this is a reason for an embargo on dyes any more than it would be a reason for an embargo on all other importations coming from countries with a low rate of exchange. I think the word "embargo" is the most hated word in American history. We can tolerate it in time of war, but not in time of peace.

Again, we must raise some money on our imports for the need of the Government. Europe owes us $18,000,000,000. She can not pay it in gold, because she does not have it. She can not pay it in her depreciated currency, because America will not take it; and we must arrange for some fair method of barter or exchange under such laws as wise policy will dictate. We can not restore commercial equilibrium by embargoes.

May I have the privilege of making your letter public, if I so desire, in the course of the debate?

With best wishes, I am, very sincerely,

ATLEE POMERENE.

Mr. POMERENE. In reply to my letter, Mr. Harris wrote me, under date of October 11, giving his consent. I quote his second letter:

ALLIANCE, OHIO, October 11, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 8th in reply to mine of the 5th. I am quite willing that you may make such use of my correspondence in this matter of dyestuffs as you may wish. From addresses now being delivered in different parts of the country, including one recently delivered before one of the large clubs of Alliance, it would seem that there is a well-organized effort to secure legislation that will exclude foreign dyestuffs and compel our textile, glove, thread, and other allied industries to depend upon native dyes, to be sold in many cases at much higher prices than are paid for foreign dyes, the range of shades and colors of which are admitted to be much larger than is yet the case with our dyes.

I believe such a situation will be very unfortunate at this time and put important American industries at a serious and far-reaching disadvantage. They will have some disadvantage in the matter of wages paid in factories and in the overcoming of some prejudice that arose against our textiles and other merchandise in Habana and other markets during the war because of the inability of merchants to guarantee colors or to furnish styles and patterns that customers wanted.

It is to be remembered that the great textile and other allied industries of Europe are in many cases only a few hours' ride by automobile or train from some of the large dyestuff centers of Germany. It may be taken for granted that this geographical nearness, long-standing trade relations, often coupled with close personal relations, familiarity with three or four modern languages on the part of most important business men, and a vastly larger relative importance of international trade than with us will all tend to set wholly aside the mere question as to where dyestuffs needed in this or that industry are made. The chief problem will be to get back into the markets. The actual hostility between great industries and industrial leaders was far less than between some other classes affected by the war. The newspapers tell us that Hugo Stinnes, the now most prominent industrial magnate in Germany, was given a great ovation on a recent visit to London. One of the best known dyestuff manufacturers in the Frankfort district, a widely traveled, intelligent man, intermarried with a British wife, told a party of American newspaper men during the war in my presence, I having introduced them to him, that on the day that Italy entered the war the largest textile manufacturer in Milan, Italy, called at his office in Frankfort explaining that he came only to express his regret as to the situation and to say that just as soon as the war was over his company would resume business relations just as before.

On the ground one saw and heard much that suggested that after all the closest and strongest international relations are apt to be those of commerce and trade. Europe had gone very much farther than we had in the establishment of such relations in all parts of the world. The problem will now be to regain the markets temporarily closed during the war. We should not deceive ourselves as to the competition that awaits us on both hemispheres. During more than two and a half years in Habana as consul general, following our entry into the war, I heard much as to the lower standards of dyes used on merchandise sold there, refusals to guarantee colors as well as the very high prices at which much of the merchandise was sold. The problem in that market, within a hundred miles of our own shores, as well in those of all other countries, will be that of meeting competition as well or better equipped than ever before. Hundreds of worn garments could be secured by European salesmen in Habana that would not tend to recommend the dyestuffs that to a considerable extent found their way into the markets of that city during the war and were accepted as one of the incidents of the war. If we are to secure and hold the trade of such markets we must be absolutely abreast with our competitors in quality, in price, and in the intelligence and skill used in the markets themselves.

Very sincerely, yours,

H. W. HARRIS.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, that tells the story as I see it. The letters I have read are not from a man who is controlled by his prejudices. His letters indicate that he is a very observing, intelligent man, and he is one consul general who proved a great credit to his country in the service abroad.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Harris at Mannheim, that being one of the places referred to in his letter, and I know what interest he took in American affairs while in Germany. I wish to state further to the Senator that I shall ask and hope for his assistance when the question referred to by him reaches the floor of the Senate, and I trust our efforts may be successful, to the end that no embargo shall be placed upon dyestuffs coming into the United States. If I have any influence in this body—and there are others who think as I do—there will be no embargo placed on dyestuffs coming into the United States when the regular tariff bill comes before the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, with a necessity confronting our great cotton, our great woolen, and our great silk mills to manufacture as good a product for sale at home and abroad as any other nation could desire, to think of crippling those industries by an embargo on foreign dyes, is to my mind preposterous. The embargo is a protective tariff run mad. The same plea that can be made now for an embargo on dyestuffs can as well be made for almost any other product.

We hear a good deal said about building a Chinese wall around the country. That is what it would be if we were to place the tariff so high that the people of other nations could not deal with us. By the pending measure it is sought to continue this embargo. It will be a Chinese wall which will keep out German dyes, but at the same time it will prevent our manufacturers from getting the necessary materials with which to enable them to command the markets of the world.

Mr. President, with all due respect to those who differ from me, I think this legislation is ill advised, and I shall take pleasure in voting against it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from North Dakota, who is in charge of the bill. Under the present emergency tariff law, which was passed on May 27, 1921, the duty on wheat was fixed at 35 cents a bushel. Has the wheat farmer obtained more for his product since the passage of that bill than he did before?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, one question deserves another. Is there any product in the United States the producer of which gets more for it than he did in May, 1921?

Mr. McKELLAR. Surely. Cotton, on which the majority declined to place a tariff, is worth double what it then was.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are many conditions, Mr. President, generally affecting agricultural products. Some of those products have gone down; oats have gone heavily, while some products have gone up a little. The questions what the price would have been without the tariff and what effect the tariff may have had, neither the Senator nor I could answer in the brief time that we have for the discussion of this matter. I do not intend to reargue or rehash what has been gone over twice when this matter has been previously before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not want to get into a controversy about it. The Senator declined to let the bill go over until to-morrow and be voted on then. It seems in his view to be such an emergency matter that it must be voted on to-day. I want to get a little information about it. That is all. There are a number of articles that we were told when the bill was passed in May, 1921, or prior to the bill's passage, that it was necessary to put a tariff on in the immediate and vital interest of the farmer. It was called a farmers' emergency bill by the Republicans. Unless it passed immediately the farmers would perish. I have in my hands the law setting out the list of articles on which emergency duties were placed, and I merely wanted to ask, without any controversy at all, what the present situation is with regard to each of those articles. I want to know what the farmers are now getting for these articles. In other words, how much good did this emergency tariff do them? As wheat is the first one of the articles on which this emergency tariff was placed, I asked the Senator, not in a spirit of controversy but to get the facts, if the wheat farmer has received more for his wheat since the passage of this act than he did before.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have not looked over the records for months to see what the price of wheat was, or whether it is going up or going still further down; but let me say to the Senator in all frankness that the Senator voted against this measure when it was before the Senate the two previous times when it appeared before us.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I voted against it because I knew it would not benefit the farmers, and because I believed it to be sham legislation so far as they were concerned. Subsequent events have proved that I was right, and for the same reasons I shall vote against this bill continuing that bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will vote against it again. No matter what the Senator may find in those records, he will continue to vote against it; and I have no doubt in the world that the Senator will not find anything in the records of prices that would change his vote. Therefore, as that is a foregone conclusion, what is the necessity of delaying a vote for certain information which the Senator wants which will not change his vote in the slightest degree? The Senator can put that information before the Senate at any time, whereas we are pressed for time in the consideration of measures that are bound to come up to-morrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, to show my great desire to help the Senator, I am not objecting to the consideration of the bill now or even an immediate vote on it. There are some 28 subjects of tariff taxation here in this so-called farmers' emergency act. I know that the Senator is such an expert on tariff matters, and especially farmers' tariffs, that he can tell me just as fast as I can ask the questions whether or not the American farmer or producer gets more for each of those products than he did before the passage of this bill.

For instance, the Senator knows that wheat has gone down. He knows that wheat flour and semolina have gone down since the passage of this act; that flaxseed has gone down, and that corn has gone down to such an extent that they are burning it out West. I notice that there is a tariff of 15 cents per bushel on it, and I saw in the paper that it was selling for 20 cents, I believe, out West somewhere. I was wondering what would have happened to it if we had not had this tariff of 15 cents a pound, if the tariff affects it as is urged by you gentlemen on the other side. Here is a tariff of 15 cents a bushel and corn selling at about 20 cents.

Of course, the Senator knows that beans have gone down, and that peanuts or ground beans, on which there is a tariff of 3 cents per pound under this act, have gone down, and potatoes and onions and rice and lemons and oils have gone down; that cattle and sheep and fresh or frozen beef, and cattle and sheep and other stock imported for breeding purposes, have gone down, and that long-staple cotton, even, has not held its own with other cotton upon which there is no tariff, and that manufactures of cotton and I believe even wool have gone down. I am not so sure about wool, but I see the wool expert sitting before me, my good friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and I will ask him whether I am right. I may be wrong about some of these things, and I want Senators who are experts to tell me when I make a mistake as to prices, because I want to find out what the facts are.

As I recall this bill, it was passed for the relief of the farmers of the country, and if the farmer is getting less for his products than he did before the passage of the act it is very doubtful whether the farmer has gotten very much out of it. Indeed, the farmers, in my judgment, have received no relief from this measure, and I doubt if it was ever intended they should receive relief from it. Giving it the name of "farmers' emergency tariff bill" was a blind to put through in the Congress a bill the main purpose of which was to aid the big interests.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield so that I can find out about wool.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator need not yield. I thought he asked me a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did. I yield in order that the Senator may answer it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will say to the Senator that if it had not been for the tariff of 15 cents a pound put upon wool, there is not a single woolgrower in the West who would have been out of bankruptcy to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is my good friend's opinion, and I respect his opinion very much, but what I want to know is the fact; and the question is whether or not wool has gone down since the passage of this act.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; wool is higher to-day than it was then.

Mr. McKELLAR. How much higher?

Mr. SMOOT. That depends upon the grades.

Mr. McKELLAR. About how much?

Mr. SMOOT. I should say that half-breed wool was about 42 cents when this bill was passed, and it is 62 cents to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know that the passage of the bill has helped the woolgrower. Of the innumerable producers mentioned in the bill the woolgrower alone has been helped by it.

Mr. SMOOT. It certainly has.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know it. That is one farmer—the farmer that raises sheep—that it has helped. If there are any others who have been helped, let Senators speak out. If I make any other mistakes I want any other Senator to let me know about it, because I am not an expert on these prices and I have not had time to look into them, and these gentlemen in front of me are experts and I want to know what the facts are.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I want to say to him that this factor should be taken into account, though, in determining the advance of wool: As the Senator knows, following the armistice for a considerable period the mills of the United States did not purchase wool as extensively as they had theretofore and, of course, the prices of wool went down. In May, over a year ago, they ceased to buy at all, or practically ceased purchasing, and the supplies of woolen goods in the United States were reduced to a minimum. During the last few months the mills have begun to buy, and they are manufacturing; and, in my opinion, there would have been an increase in the price of wool regardless of the imposition of any tariff. The law of supply and demand operates in the woolen trade as in everything else. Where there is a demand for wool prices go up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Ah, there is some difference of opinion about wool. Here are the two Utah Senators differing about whether the popgun tariff has helped the woolgrowers. I suspect, in other words, wool is in the same situation that cotton is in, relatively. Cotton has gone up, nearly doubled in value, because there was a shortage of production, and so wool has gone up—nothing like so much as cotton, but in the same way. Everybody knows that no tariff was placed on cotton, the kind of cotton that really counts in this country, which is about 90 per cent of the whole. The tariff was placed only on Imperial Valley cotton principally.

On cotton, generally speaking, however, there is no tariff, and here the cotton farmer has received nearly twice as much this fall for his crop as he was getting before this bill passed.

Now let me go on just a little further, because I am after information, and if any Senator in this Chamber can say of his own knowledge that I am making a mistake about any of these matters I am talking about I want him to call my attention to it, because I do not want to make mistakes. I want any Senator who disagrees to stand up and speak.

Mr. President, last February, when the original farmers' emergency tariff bill was being proposed I discussed it on the theory that it would have the effect claimed by its proponents, viz, that it would increase the prices of farm products mentioned in it. I called attention to the title of the bill, which was "To impose temporary duties upon certain agricultural products, to meet the present emergency, to provide revenue, and for other purposes."

I said then that this title was a misnomer, that it ought to be called "A bill to increase the cost of living or to aid the profiteers, or to aid the Sugar Trust, or to aid the Dye Trust, or to aid the profiteers and speculators in stable food products." The law as passed did not have the effect that its proponents claimed for it in so far as the raising of the produce of farm products is concerned. It no doubt did have the effect of aiding the Powder or Dye Trust, to some extent the Sugar Trust, and possibly some profiteers and speculators. As I have heretofore pointed out, it did not help the farmers at all. The trouble about any tariff on agricultural products is that it does not protect them. The farmers have to harvest their products in accordance with the seasons. The prices of their products are fixed in the markets of the world. The law of supply and demand can not be overturned with respect to them, and the result is that a tariff on farm products can not be of material benefit to the farmers. I stated at that time that the bill's purpose was not to help the farmers and that it would not help them. That if it had any effect at all it would greatly injure the consumers of the country without a great benefit to the farmers. In the course of that speech I said, among other things:

You are presenting this bill as an emergency measure to help the farmer, and I am showing to you in my humble way that this is a mistake; that you are not helping the farmer; that you are legislating the people's money into the hands of the speculators and the profiteers; and a precious little of it, not enough to tell a tale, is going into the farmers' pockets.

Now, Mr. President, after six months experience with this so-called farmer's emergency tariff bill, the statements I then made about it, in so far as the actual aid to the farmers is concerned, were absolutely correct. Under the undisputed facts, no farmer nor producer has been benefited by this act, except possibly the woolgrower, and there is great conflict of opinion as to whether this tariff law has had any effect on the price of wool, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] saying it has benefited the price, and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] not believing it has helped the price. At all events, to call it a farmer's measure is certainly a misnomer, because the farmer has not benefited by it. The only people who were really benefited were the Dye Trust, or Powder Trust which owns the Dye Trust, and possibly some of the other trusts. The farmer was led to believe it would help him, but as usual he was buncoed. It will be noted that while I have asked any Senator in the Chamber who thinks it has benefited any farm product in his State to get up and say so, the only one who has done so is the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and he claims only that it has benefited wool. The best possible thing that can be said of this bill is that it did not have the effect of raising the prices as its proponents claimed, and that therefore the consumers were not taxed to the extent that it was believed they would be taxed.

Now, turning to the other specific items that I have here:

The next item is sugar. Is the sugar farmer getting more for his sugar now than he got before May 27, 1921, when this act was passed? If he is not, I can not understand why he should be enamored of this act.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I merely want to make this statement to the Senator from Tennessee: If this act is not continued, the sugar farmer will get 60 cents a hundred less than he is getting now.

Mr. McKELLAR. With all frankness, I want to say that the Senator from Louisiana is in the same position that the Senator from Utah was in a while ago when he was talking about wool. I respect the opinion of the Senator from Louisiana that the farmer would be getting less if it were not for this law, but that is an opinion of the Senator. The fact is that the Louisiana cane grower is getting less for the product of his toil than he did before the passage of this act. What it is due to is another thing. I may have one view about it and the Senator may have another. The Senator knows that there is no tariff on cotton, which is also raised in the South, and in the Senator's State, and yet it has doubled in value.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I just want to make this remark without getting into any controversy——

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to be controversial about it, because I think the facts are so absolute that they are prohibitive of controversy. The prices of all these farm products upon which a duty was imposed have gone down except one—wool—and there can not be any controversy about the facts.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The facts are that there are a million and a half tons of sugar in Cuba now, ready for shipment here; and if the rate is lowered, of course that will assist that sugar in reaching this market, thereby reducing our prices.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will go on.

The next item is butter and substitutes therefor. Let me ask Senators from the butter States, Has butter gone up, and is the butter producer, the dairyman, getting more for his butter since the passage of this emergency farmers' bill? I want to show the falsity of the claims made in behalf of this tariff measure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I could answer many of the Senator's questions if I wanted to get into an argument.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want the Senator to get into an argument; I just want an answer—that is all.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can turn immediately to the reports that we get in our daily press and compare them as well as I can. All I want to say now is that we were here until nearly 2 o'clock this morning, and, as the Senator has said, we are tired, and at the present time I would really rather get a vote upon this bill than even convert the Senator from Tennessee to the protective principle.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt the Senator would be very glad indeed not to have these matters brought out before the people of the United States. I can understand that. I can understand his desire that the falsity of the claims made for this bill be not pointed out. He does not want it shown that it is really a dye or powder trust bill pure and simple, and not a farmer's bill at all. When will the farmers of the country wake up to these humbug measures put through Congress in their name? Without the aid of the farmers' bloc in the Senate this dye or powder trust bill could never have been passed. I urged the Senator to let this matter go over until to-morrow. I told him when the bill was first called up that I was tired and worn out, and that we ought not to be called on to legislate to-day. The Senator was not willing to do that, and seemed to indicate that I was trying to put off a vote. I do not want to do that. Politically, I should like to have the Senator pass a bill like this. The faster he passes a bill like this, so far as the political side of it is concerned, the better it is for this side of the Chamber; but I know it is not for the best interests of the country, and I do want to know about these facts, and I want to finish the items that were in this farmers' emergency tariff bill. It was argued at the time that it was a bill to keep the farmers from being reduced to starvation, and in every instance, except as to the wool farmer, so far as we have gone, the farmer has been getting less for his product since the passage of the bill than he was getting before.

Now I go to the next class:

Cheese and substitutes therefor, 23 per cent ad valorem.

Has cheese gone up or down? My information is that it has gone down.

Milk, fresh, 2 cents per gallon; cream, 5 cents per gallon.

I understand that with the exception of those places where the Milk Trust is undertaking to get hold and to oppress the users of milk, in some of the great cities, milk is not as dear as it was.

Milk, preserved or condensed, or sterilized by heating or other processes, 2 cents per pound; sugar of milk, 5 cents per pound.

Wrapper tobacco.

I do not know whether wrapper tobacco has gone up or not. That is tobacco which is raised principally in Connecticut, and the Connecticut Senators could easily tell us whether the Connecticut tobacco farmers have profited by the passage of this bill. They do not answer. I have my doubts about it.

Apples, 30 cents per bushel.

I understand they have gone down.

Cherries in a raw state.

I do know what has happened to cherries, and I do not care very much, because they are not of very much food value.

Olives.

Olives have gone down.

I here quote the exact words of the statute and the amount of duty that is put upon each of the 28 items:

[Public, No. 10, Sixty-seventh Congress.]

An act (H. R. 2435) imposing temporary duties upon certain agricultural products to meet present emergencies and to provide revenue; to regulate commerce with foreign countries; to prevent dumping of foreign merchandise on the markets of the United States; to regulate the value of foreign money, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, TITLE I.

EMERGENCY TARIFF.

That on and after the day following the passage of this act, for the period of six months, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the following articles, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the rates of duty which are prescribed by this section, namely:

1. Wheat, 35 cents per bushel.
2. Wheat flour and semolina, 20 per cent ad valorem.
3. Flaxseed, 30 cents per bushel of 56 pounds.
4. Corn or maize, 15 cents per bushel of 56 pounds.

5. Beans, provided for in paragraph 197 of the act entitled "An act to reduce tariff duties and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved October 3, 1913, 2 cents per pound.
6. Peanuts or ground beans, 3 cents per pound.
7. Potatoes, 25 cents per bushel of 60 pounds.
8. Onions, 40 cents per bushel of 57 pounds.
9. Rice, cleaned, 2 cents per pound, except rice cleaned for use in the manufacture of canned foods, on which the rate of duty shall be 1 cent per pound; uncleaned rice, or rice free of the outer hull and still having the inner cuticle on, 1⅛ cents per pound; rice flour, and rice meal, and rice broken which will pass through a No. 12 wire sieve of a kind prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound; paddy, or rice having the outer hull on, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound.
10. Lemons, 2 cents per pound.
11. Oils: Peanut, 26 cents per gallon; cottonseed, coconut, and soya bean, 20 cents per gallon; olive, 40 cents per gallon in bulk, 50 cents per gallon in containers of less than 5 gallons.
12. Cattle, 30 per cent ad valorem.
13. Sheep: One year old or over, $2 per head; less than 1 year old, $1 per head.
14. Fresh or frozen beef, veal, mutton, lamb, and pork, 2 cents per pound. Meats of all kinds, prepared or preserved, not specially provided for herein, 25 per cent ad valorem.
15. Cattle and sheep and other stock imported for breeding purposes shall be admitted free of duty.
16. Cotton having a staple of 1⅛ inches or more in length, 7 cents per pound.
17. Manufactures of which cotton of the kind provided for in paragraph 16 is the component material of chief value, 7 cents per pound, in addition to the rates of duty imposed thereon by existing law.
18. Wool, commonly known as clothing wool, including hair of the camel, angora goat, and alpaca, but not such wools as are commonly known as carpet wools: Unwashed, 15 cents per pound; washed, 30 cents per pound; scoured, 45 cents per pound. Unwashed wools shall be considered such as shall have been shorn from the animal without any cleaning; washed wools shall be considered such as have been washed with water only on the animal's back or on the skin; wools washed in any other manner than on the animal's back or on the skin shall be considered as scoured wool. On wool and hair provided for in this paragraph, which is sorted or increased in value by the rejection of any part of the original fleece, the duty shall be twice the duty to which it would otherwise be subject, but not more than 45 cents per pound.
19. Wool and hair of the kind provided for in paragraph 18, when advanced in any manner or by any process of manufacture beyond the washed or scoured condition, and manufactures of which wool or hair of the kind provided for in paragraph 18 is the component material of chief value, 45 cents per pound in addition to the rates of duty imposed thereon by existing law.
20. Sugars, tank bottoms, sirups of cane juice, melada, concentrated melada, concrete and concentrated molasses, testing by the polariscope not above 75°, one and sixteen one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, and for every additional degree shown by the polariscopic test, four one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound additional, and fractions of a degree in proportion; molasses testing not above 40°, 24 per cent ad valorem; testing above 40° and not above 56°, 3½ cents per gallon; testing above 56°, 7 cents per gallon; sugar drainings and sugar sweepings shall be subject to duty as molasses or sugar, as the case may be, according to polariscopic test.
21. Butter, and substitutes therefor, 6 cents per pound.
22. Cheese, and substitutes therefor, 23 per cent ad valorem.
23. Milk, fresh, 2 cents per gallon; cream, 5 cents per gallon.
24. Milk, preserved or condensed, or sterilized by heating or other processes, including weight of immediate coverings, 2 cents per pound; sugar of milk, 5 cents per pound.
25. Wrapper tobacco and filler tobacco when mixed or packed with more than 15 per cent of wrapper tobacco, and all leaf tobacco the product of two or more countries or dependencies when mixed or packed together, if unstemmed, $2.35 per pound; if stemmed, $3 per pound; filler tobacco not specially provided for in this section, if unstemmed, 35 cents per pound; if stemmed, 50 cents per pound.
The term "wrapper tobacco" as used in this section means that quality of leaf tobacco which has the requisite color, texture, and burn, and is of sufficient size for cigar wrappers, and the term "filler tobacco" means all other leaf tobacco.
26. Apples, 30 cents per bushel.
27. Cherries in a raw state, preserved in brine or otherwise, 3 cents per pound.
28. Olives, in solutions, 25 cents per gallon; olives, not in solutions, 3 cents per pound.

There are 28 items, potatoes among them, 28 items that the farmers of the country raise, and gentlemen on the other side of the aisle said that this was emergency tariff legislation for the benefit of the farmers, and they say so now. Yet since the passage of the act, so far as it appears, there is but one class of farmers which could have possibly been benefited, and that is the wool farmers, the sheep raisers, and they only in the matter of wool, under the peculiar conditions stated by the junior Senator from Utah; and the senior Senator from Utah believes, and I know he is sincere in believing, because he is a sincere man and is greatly interested in the wool business, as he ought to be, as it is a great industry in his State, that this has done the wool farmers some good, and I am very glad if it has done them good. If a bill of this kind, passed for the help of all the farmers of the country, benefits only the wool farmers, I think they ought to be congratulated.

Just one word about wheat. As I understand it, the price of wheat is fixed in London. It makes no difference what our tariff on wheat may be, the price paid is that based on the London price, and yet we are keeping all wheat out of this country, we are preventing our railroads from hauling wheat through this country, taking away a tremendous revenue from them, all under the provisions of this act.

Mr. President, that is about all I have to say. If I have made a mistake about the farmer not being benefited in respect of any one of the 28 particulars found in this bill except on wool, which is a matter of opinion, I invite any Senator who is in favor of this bill to point out my mistake. No Senator accepts the challenge and I assume my facts have been accurately stated. Mr. President, this bill, like its forerunner, is a delusion and a snare so far as the farmers are concerned. The proof on that point is indisputable.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I would like to say just a word, especially to my good friend from Tennessee. There is a question, as to many of these articles, whether a tariff has done or can do any good to the producers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know any one of the 28 that I have named the producer of which gets more for his product since the law was passed than he did before, except in the case of wool? That is a question which can be easily answered in a word.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I answer that by saying that I have not thought it necessary to make that inquiry at this time, because a great many people in this country feel that this bill will help their respective industries, and I believe it is generally recognized that if anything can be done to help industry at this time it should be done.

Personally, I do not believe that the imposition of a tariff duty on many of the articles mentioned in the bill will be or can be of any great help to the producer, and the amount of the help which might be given to any line is problematical; but the psychology of the situation throughout the country ought to be taken into consideration now. Many of the people feel that it would aid. Certainly, if it does not do them any good, it can not do them any harm, and this is no time, it seems to me, to consider the merits or the demerits of the tariff upon such articles as those mentioned in the emergency tariff bill.

The Finance Committee has started in to hold hearings upon these various subjects, and we realize the enormous amount of labor connected with that work, and no one feels that we should now go into the merits or demerits of the tariff upon these specific articles.

I do not think, on the other hand, that anybody would seriously advocate that this bill, which has passed the Congress and which was limited in time as to its operation, should not be continued until Congress has had an opportunity to deal with this great, broad subject in a general way, and it seems to me every practical consideration leads to the thought that we should pass this bill, and without any delay.

I do not believe this is the time to consider the merits or demerits of such a proposal as this, and I sincerely trust that we may not enter into a controversy over it, because it will have to come up on its merits, will be discussed pro and con from day to day in the Senate, and everybody will have an opportunity to discuss every phase of it.

Owing to the other work which we all have before us, I respectfully urge that we pass this bill now, and continue the status quo until we come to revise the general tariff bill, which we shall do in the near future.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the action of the Republican members of the Finance Committee in hastily moving to take up for consideration the so-called emergency tariff bill comes as a surprise to the Senate. We have just passed the revenue bill, and it was understood that the Senate would be engaged for a number of days in the consideration of what has been called the "beer bill" and the railroad funding bill, and other important measures. So far as I can learn, no intimation was given that this bill would be reported from the Finance Committee to-day, or that the Senate would be asked to enter upon its consideration. Senators understood that the bill was still with the Finance Committee, that hearings would be had, and that some time would elapse before it would be reported to the Senate. From what I have been able to ascertain since the Senator from North Dakota submitted his motion for the consideration of this bill—and I have hurriedly spoken to a number of Senators who were in the Chamber—some of the Republican members of the Finance Committee, without holding a meeting and in a purely informal manner, agreed within the past half hour to report the bill and ask for its immediate consideration. This method of procedure is somewhat startling and can not be approved as a method of obtaining sound and well-considered legislation.

As stated, this action comes as a surprise to the Senate; and if Senators had intended to debate or contest the passage of the reported bill, this precipitate action would have the effect of preventing it. However, the overwhelming Republican majority in this body assures the passage of any measure which the majority party approves; and apparently any measure, if it is denominated a "tariff bill," will command the support of Republican Senators, regardless of its effect upon our foreign trade and commerce or the evils which it will inflict upon the American people.

Mr. President, in view of the position taken by the ranking member of the minority on the Finance Committee, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], as well as that of other members of the minority on the same committee, and in view of the evident purpose of the majority to speedily force the passage of this bill, I shall not engage in any dilatory proceedings, but content myself with a few observations pertinent to this proposed legislation and a brief discussion of the dye embargo provision carried in the pending bill.

I do not desire to convey the impression that the minority Members of the Senate are in favor of this bill or that the dye provisions of the bill meet the approval of all Republicans. I believe that every Democrat is opposed to any legislation that will perpetuate the power of the dye monopoly, which has been so active in procuring an embargo and in carrying on a nation-wide propaganda to deceive the American people. The statement just made by my colleague [Mr. SMOOT], that he will never favor an embargo upon dyestuffs, I hope represents the views of a considerable number of the Republicans. I am led to believe that many Republicans oppose the provisions of the bill extending the embargo on dyestuffs, but there are some, as I understand, who entertain the view that affirmative action in respect of this bill will more clearly reveal the oppressive and indefensible character of the dye monopoly and the unmitigated evil which would result if permanent legislation were enacted in harmony with the demands of the dye lobby.

This reasoning, in my opinion, is unsound. It is a great mistake to temporize in any manner with this powerful monopoly, whose pernicious activity has not been confined to Washington but has been coextensive with the limits of our national domain. There is only one way to deal with an evil, and that is to grapple with it and to destroy it. If concessions are made, its demands are multiplied and its insolence and audacity are increased.

On the 27th of May of this year the so-called emergency tariff bill was approved, and the pending bill is to extend the provisions of that act until a general tariff measure is enacted. I indicated in the brief colloquy a few moments ago with the Senator from North Dakota that in view of the unsettled conditions of foreign exchange and the chaotic economic situation throughout the world, particularly Europe, it would be a most injudicious, if not to say fatal, thing for Congress to enact a general tariff law at this session or in the immediate future. Our foreign commerce has been profoundly affected by the dislocated industrial condition of Europe and by reason of the financial depression existing in every European country and the threatened bankruptcy of many nations of the earth. The refusal of the United States to ratify the Versailles treaty has contributed to the economic and political demoralization of Europe. That demoralization has reacted greatly to the disadvantage of the American people and has been one of the predominant causes of the financial and industrial depression in our own country. We should have learned the lesson—but, unfortunately, we have not—that our domestic prosperity is inseparably connected with our foreign trade.

It was thought that the lessons taught by the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill had been appreciated by the Republican Party, and that with a broader vision and sounder and more patriotic views, they would address themselves to the important questions involved in revenue and tariff legislation. But, apparently, the Republicans are as blind now as they were in the past; upon economic and industrial questions, their views are as narrow and parochial as they were when trusts and combinations and special interests and favored corporations wrote tariff schedules and dictated the domestic, as well as the foreign, policies of the Republic. The Republican Party seems incapable of emancipating itself from the thraldom and heresies of the past. Republican leaders seem to be creatures of opinions and are guided by the law of opinions, and not by the law of wisdom. It was John Seldon who said:

> It was a good fancy of the old Platonic: Men had some things whereof the gods, which were above them, did partake, as intellect and knowledge; and they had some things of which the beasts, which were below them, did partake, as senses and passions; and some things of which neither gods nor beasts did partake, which gave them all their troubles and made all the confusion in the world—namely, opinions.

Many Senators and Representatives belonging to the majority party entertain the "opinion" that to exclude imports will promote domestic felicity and unbounded national prosperity. The antiquated and unscientific "opinions" of Republican statesmen have made "confusion" and wrought immeasurable harm. They do not seem to appreciate the fact that they have been reduced to mechanical figures, to be moved and directed as corporations and great interests determine. The protected interests in the United States for many years controlled the Republican Party, fashioned its creed, determined its policies, formulated its "opinions," and phrased the sentences uttered by politicians and statesmen to carry such opinions to all parts of the land. Has there been any change in the texture of Republicanism or in the policies of the Republican Party? Let seekers after facts answer.

The Republican Party is now in power. The old leadership of special interests, of those seeking class legislation, is reasserting itself; and here and throughout the land their power is being manifested and their purposes accomplished.

As stated, many Republicans still cling to archaic policies and insist upon legislation which is an anachronism and is repudiated by the maxims of Adam Smith and the views of political economists and statesmen of recognized worth. Demands are made for legislation prohibiting imports; and yet those submitting such demands clamor for measures that will facilitate and increase exports. Apparently they are not insensible to the fact that the prosperity of the agriculturalists and the manufacturers and, indeed, all classes of our citizenship is dependent upon foreign markets; and yet they would erect barriers that would cut off our trade with all nations.

The farmer realizes that he must secure beyond the seas markets for his surplus products; the live-stock interests know that if the ports of the world are closed to their meat products that important industry will enter upon a period of decay; the producers of our mineral wealth know that if Europe does not purchase copper and other mineral products our mines will be closed and this great industry brought to the verge of ruin. American manufacturers must appreciate the fact that the "home market," important as it is, will not consume all the products of mill and factory and plant, and that unless foreign markets be secured stagnation will come to the manufacturing interests of our land. And labor keenly senses the fact that there must be an abundant production of raw materials, as well as of manufactured and finished products, in order that the millions of laboring men and women of our country may obtain suitable employment and enjoy the prosperity to which they, in common with all other classes, are entitled. This situation must be patent to all thoughtful and unbiased observers; and it should carry impressive lessons to those entrusted with legislative and executive authority.

However, so insidious has been the propaganda in favor of embargoes and tariffs, and so persistent and truculent have been the demands of special interests and the beneficiaries of high protection, that the public mind has become befogged and Congress beguiled into false positions and unwise, if not destructive, legislation. We are following economic formula accepted in ancient and medieval times; perhaps historical accuracy should compel a modification of the statement, because there were periods when sanity and vision characterized the relations between different nations. There were peoples of different races who at times battered down artificial walls, which prevented trade and commerce and those mutual exchanges and civilities promotive of fraternity and increased prosperity.

Following the Civil War the profiteers in the North conspired and intrigued to continue their exploitation of the people. Their flag, which was not the Stars and Stripes, carried the word "protection." It was a most seductive word, and it proved to be a most deceptive one. The agriculturists, who always suffer most from tariff exactions, were soon captivated by the fallacious arguments of the exploiters, and followed for many years with blind fidelity the sordid and selfish leadership of the protected industries of our country. Selling their surplus products in foreign markets and at prices fixed in foreign markets, the agriculturists were compelled to pay tribute of hundreds of millions annually to the tariff barons of the United States who controlled the Republican Party and fashioned its legislation. Billions of dollars were wrung from the masses of the people which went into the pockets of the manufacturing interests of the United States. Laws were enacted which legalized robbery, and the masses of the people meekly accepted the yoke which their masters placed upon their bowed necks.

Mr. Roosevelt, in his melodramatic campaign for the Presidency, when he led a revolt against the reactionary and standpat forces of his own party, denounced the predatory interests and the invisible government which had dominated his party, and the special interests which had prepared tariff legislation and secured and maintained prices of commodities, essential to the welfare of the people, at levels so high as to oppress the masses and add to the swollen fortunes of the favored few.

The heresies of protection—the evils of reactionary Republicanism—reappear under this administration and follow the old standards with Bourbonlike pertinacity. Indeed, there is an audacity accompanying the activities of Republican leadership as it deals with fiscal and tariff measures that is reminiscent of the reign of the tariff kings two or three decades ago.

We are now to put into practice the theory that an exchange of commodities among nations is the sure precursor of financial and industrial disaster. We are told that if the products of other nations are admitted to our shores it will impoverish the American people and bring disaster to our economic life. We are regaled with a political philosophy taught by British statesmen prior to the days of Bright and Cobden, when high tariff laws were enforced which brought sorrow and distress and want and famine to the people of Great Britain. We are again to worship the fetich of high protection and follow the canons of the mercantile system.

The catastrophic conditions existing in the United States to-day, resulting largely from the shrinkage of our foreign trade, teach no lesson and furnish no guide to those controlling the Republican Party. In the face of the foreign-exchange situation, and with the certainty that Europe's purchases of our products will be reduced to the vanishing point unless her production increases, and we accept in payment for our surplus products the commodities of European nations, the Republicans propose to continue in force the emergency tariff act and to enact a general tariff law which will contain rates and schedules so high that importations will be prohibited.

I referred to those who exploited the people of the North in the days of the Civil War. In the recent war many American manufacturers entered into combinations or formed agreements and understandings under which they were enabled to increase the prices of their products far beyond the limits of avarice. The World War prevented foreign competition, so they enjoyed an unchallenged monopoly. With the end of the war they determined to maintain the high prices which they had enjoyed during the war; indeed, for more than a year after the armistice prices continued to mount in practically all American products, particularly those manufactured and fabricated. The Sherman antitrust law was flouted and combinations in restraint of trade and to destroy competition flourished. Stock dividends, as well as enormous cash dividends, were declared in many of the great industries, and the owners of the plants and the stockholders of the corporations received hundreds of millions that were wrongfully exacted from the people.

These same forces are now determined to continue their predatory activities and to secure tariff legislation that will protect them in their nefarious operations. The same insincere and false statements are being made as were employed in years that are past, and in every part of the land a propaganda is waged in the interest of tariff laws that will insure to American manufacturers a complete monopoly of the home market and enable them to continue their exploitation of the American consumer. The legislation proposed by these interests and by the Republican Party would prove an effectual embargo as to foreign products and would result in the erection of a wall, invisible though it might be, which would diminish, if it did not inhibit, American exports. No course could be more foolish or disastrous to American trade and commerce and to the American people than that which has been projected by the protected interests and offered by the Republican administration.

When we were exporting, as we did during the war, commodities of the value of between $7,000,000,000 and $8,000,000,000 per annum there was general prosperity throughout the land. We imported annually between $5,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000 of foreign products, and settled the balances in our favor by taking Europe's gold supply and receiving back American securities owned by Europeans of the value of billions of dollars, and finally we obtained in payment European securities—obligations of the nations of Europe as well as of their nationals. We have drained the world of its gold supply, and have brought back to our own land substantially all American securities which at the outbreak of the war were owned abroad. The people of Europe have reached the limit of their purchasing power until they can pay for the products which they buy with commodities which they manufacture or produce. Our quest for foreign markets will end in failure unless the fleets of the world can bear to our shores the wealth which other nations produce and which the American people require. The world is suffering not from overproduction but from underproduction. The nations cry aloud for our raw materials as well as our finished products. They will buy them if we will accept in payment therefor that which they can and will produce. We must not freeze the currents of trade and commerce which should flow throughout the world, bearing prosperity and joy to the peoples of all lands.

The nations of Europe need every pound of copper which the mines of the West can produce. The mills of Great Britain and Germany and other European nations would be active, furnishing work for millions, if means could be provided to secure American cotton, millions of bales of which are seeking markets. The farmers of the South are threatened with bankruptcy because of the low price of cotton and their inability to find buyers, even at price levels so low that the producers sustain a loss in growing it. Our ships are idle for want of exports and imports, and our exports will continue to dwindle until our imports are increased.

When the free cities of Germany, known as the Hanseatic League, broke away from the economic heresies of the age and engaged in untrammeled trade and commerce prosperity came to the people and greater freedom and liberty became the inheritance of their inhabitants. They carried the torch of progress which lighted the way and at the same time consumed many of the foolish traditions and oppressive forms which obstructed progress and impaired the enjoyment of liberty.

When the Republican Party came into power in March of this year its leaders announced principles and policies which inevitably would, if carried out, lead to national isolation and domestic economic depression. Republican policies have reacted to the disadvantage of the American people, as well as to the injury of the world. Further legislation is promised, destructive of our commerce and our merchant marine. The American people are to be committed to the mercies of manufacturing trusts and monopolies and to powerful financial interests which are chiefly concerned in domestic exploitation. One who reads the testimony given by interests whose support of the Republican Party in the recent election was brazenly proclaimed, and of various persons who voice the demands of industries already rich and powerful—in part as the result of monopolistic greed and tariff legislation—will be prepared for the legislation which may be expected at the hands of the party in power. The published hearings of the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate reveal the selfish and mercenary character of many of the protected industries of the United States.

Prof. Rabbeno, in his able work called "The American Commercial Policy," declares that—

> Reason tells us that trusts derive powerful support from protection, which renders it easier for them to make themselves masters of the home markets and to monopolize them; and facts show us, side by side in the United States, a system of protection which has been adhered to for more than 30 years with unflinching energy and a colossal and overbearing organization of industrial monopolies unknown to any other country.

The principles of justice and the equities which should be adhered to in domestic and in international affairs seem to be brushed aside by the materialistic forces which grip the Republican Party. With great glee Republican statesmen and leaders declare that the last election was a mandate for withdrawal from the affairs of the world. The generous sentiments and irrepressible ideals possessed by the American people may for the moment be curbed and held in check, but in the end the ethical forces in the land will burst all bonds and all artificial barriers, whether of statute or party creed, and America will take her place in the great procession which marches forward toward the goal of righteousness and world peace. It was Woodrow Wilson who said:

> We are going to climb the slow road until it reaches some upland where the air is fresher, where the whole talk of mere politicians is stilled, where men can look in each other's face and see that there is nothing to conceal; that all they have to talk about they are willing to talk about in the open and talk about with each other; and whence, looking back over the road, we shall see at last that we have fulfilled our promise to mankind. We had said to all the world "America was created to break every kind of monopoly and to set men free upon a footing of equality, upon a footing of opportunity, to match their brains and their energies" * * *.

Mr. President, when the emergency tariff bill was reported Republican leaders declared that it would prove a panacea for the ills with which the agricultural interests of our country were afflicted. It was to be a universal solvent which would eat away all obstructions to their prosperity. The measure was a delusion and a snare. It was a bait thrown to the farmers to secure their adherence to Republican policies. It was planned to speedily enact a tariff law which would give to American manufacturers a complete monopoly in the American markets. Knowing that the prostitution of the powers of the Government to such an end, where the results would be so baneful to the agriculturalists and the great mass of the American people, it was doubtless deemed important to enact the so-called emergency tariff law, which dealt with agricultural and live-stock products. The thought undoubtedly was entertained that if heavy tariff duties were imposed upon agricultural products, although it was known no benefit to the farmer would result therefrom, objections could not reasonably be offered by the farmers and the great body of consumers if the manufacturing interests of the United States were granted, through tariff duties, the privilege of increasing the prices of all articles and commodities produced by them. The emergency tariff law has proven a disappointment to the agriculturists. It has not, as promised, increased the prices of their farm products; but, on the contrary, the prices have consistently declined. The reason for this is obvious. With an enormous surplus, the farmer and the stock raiser were compelled to seek foreign markets. While the world, famished and hungry, desired this surplus, they were unable to purchase the same. The protected industries of the United States desire cheap agricultural products and dear manufactured commodities.

They were willing to give the farmers a gold brick if by so doing it would aid them in obtaining inordinate profits. Undoubtedly the agricultural interests of the United States have suffered greatly since the war. They have been compelled to pay enormous prices for agricultural machinery, for fuel and clothing, and all manufactured articles. While the prices of their products have fallen from 50 to more than 80 per cent, the prices of all articles which they had been compelled to purchase have not followed the same ratio of decline.

To extend the life of the emergency tariff bill will prove of no advantage to the agriculturists. It may prove of slight advantage to the sugar factories and those who are producing wool, but, in my opinion, the benefits to be derived will be far less than anticipated and will be unduly emphasized and indeed exaggerated.

But I have not had so much in mind in what I have stated the provisions of the emergency tariff law as I have the general policies, purposes, plans, and objects of the Republican Party. The measure now before us is a mere symptom of the general disease from which the party in power is suffering. It is inspired by the sordid and the selfish and the material things of life. It thinks in figures, in bank accounts, in stocks and bonds, rather than in human rights, social justice, and world freedom. Its policies are selfishly nationalistic. It would seek national isolation and escape from that world service and world fellowship which must be shared by those nations which are competent to lead and which are worthy to endure.

I desire to direct attention to one provision of the emergency tariff bill which is absolutely indefensible. Even those who believe that protection will cure all industrial and economic ills can not find justification for legislation which perpetuates the power of the dye monopoly which operates oppressively and defiantly in the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is not that about the only substantive thing in this bill? I think it is apparent to everyone that, so far as tariff for the benefit of the farmers is concerned, it is absolutely immaterial and nugatory. I do not care one whit whether this passes or not. If gentlemen want to pass it, I would like to have them pass it. I think it better that they should pass it. I have no objection. But the dye proposition is virtually the only proposition in this bill which is material.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Tennessee that the farmers will derive no benefit from this measure is quite correct. I am inclined to think that no attempt would now be made to extend the life of the emergency tariff law because of its failure to be of any benefit to the agriculturists of the United States, except for the provisions of the law which place an embargo upon all dyestuff imports.

The bill before us is not in the interest of the farmers, but it is in the interest of the dye monopoly of the United States. I will not say that the bill before us was projected by the dye lobby which is being maintained by the dye monopoly, but undoubtedly the lobby and the monopoly are employing every means within their power to secure legislation that will continue the strangle hold of the dye monopoly upon the textile industry of the United States. I have heretofore stated that no more powerful monopoly has ever infested the Capitol than the one to which I have just referred. None has been more pernicious, brazen, and defiant than the dye monopoly. It is not satisfied with high protection, but it demands a complete monopoly.

One of the representatives of the dye monopoly declared before a congressional committee that not only was an embargo demanded so that foreign dyes could not be imported into the United States, but that high tariff duties should also be laid, and that, in addition, the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law preventing trusts and monopolies should not be enforced against those engaged in the manufacture of domestic dyes. The audacity of these demands can not be understood except upon the theory that the dye monopoly had some assurance from Republican leaders that these unheard-of exactions would be granted. Heretofore monopolies that have been the favorite children of the Republican Party, have been satisfied with tariff walls behind which they could raise their prices to such levels as their cupidity suggested. They did not dare to urge an embargo so that they might charge 100 or 1,000 per cent above the fair market price, to the domestic consumer. I venture the assertion that no such extraordinary demand has ever been made by any industry, monopoly, trust, or combination as that presented by the dye monopoly of the United States. We know that it has in some instances charged as high as eight hundred and a thousand per cent for its products above prewar prices, and the American consumer of dyestuffs has been the victim of the intrigues and oppression of the dye industry of the United States. One can scarcely believe that the American Congress would bow to these extraordinary and infamous demands of the dye monopoly. It seems incredible that when the dye monopoly cracks its whip the Republicans in both the House and the Senate meekly and without protest obey the commands of a master.

Have Republican leaders considered what the effect of their course will be and how the precedent which they have established, of granting embargoes at the behest of trusts and monopolies, will affect the future? If one monopoly is entitled to an embargo in order that it may more effectually fleece the American people, why may not other combinations and trusts secure similar legislation? Have we reached that period when trusts and monopolies can dictate the measures which they desire enacted? And have the Republicans determined that the manufacturers of the United States shall have a complete monopoly and be permitted to plunder the American people at will? It would seem that this is their purpose. With the American valuation plan and by means of embargoes it is obvious that no competition is to be permitted and that American manufacturers are to have a free field in which to exploit and rob the American consumer.

I denounce the dye monopoly and the methods which it employs, the lobbies which it maintains, and the oppressive and un-American policy which it adopts. Its ascendency over Congress is remarkable and the subserviency of the Republican Party to its domination is so pitiful as to excite indignation. The trail of the dye lobby in Congress is slimy and its nation-wide activities call for condemnation.

With the present limited production of dyes in Germany and in other parts of the world there is no reason why an embargo should be placed upon dyestuffs. The fact that dyes are excluded from the United States conclusively demonstrates that the purpose of those supporting such legislation is to further enrich the members of the dye monopoly. Corporations belonging to the Dye Trust made tens of millions of dollars during and since the war, and corporations have become so great that their capital stock exceeds $100,000,000.

Attention has been called by Congressman FREAR, of Wisconsin, to the enormous profits of the dye monopoly, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] has, upon the floor of the Senate, called attention to the enormous proportions of this monopoly and the efforts which it has made and is making to secure complete control of the dye market of the United States. Former Senator Thomas, in elaborate and carefully prepared speeches, proved that the dye monopoly of the United States entered into agreement with a foreign dye monopoly, under the terms of which a large portion of the world was divided between them and competition prevented.

The subtle and hypocritical course of this domestic monopoly is revealed in the character of propaganda resorted to. It seeks to impress the people with the thought that it is a patriotic organization; that it is existing largely for the purpose of national defense; that it is broadening the fields of chemistry and laying the foundation for a broader knowledge of chemical science.

Let me briefly refer to some of the steps taken by the dye monopoly to give it complete control of the manufacture and production of dyestuffs within the United States. The Alien Property Custodian seized substantially 4,500 German chemical and dye patents. These patents belong to the German people. During the war the United States had the right, as a war measure, to sequestrate these patents as it seized other property within the United States owned by German nationals. But it was never contemplated that the private property of the German people should be confiscated. Senators and Congressmen who voted for the act authorizing the seizure of alien enemy property clearly understood that at the conclusion of hostilities the property would be restored to its owners. But the Alien Property Custodian and some associated with him conceived a plan to control these patents. They caused to be organized what is known as the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) and then transferred to this corporation all of these patents for the sum of $250,000.

These patents, of course, were worth millions, and their confiscation by the Alien Property Custodian and others is an act indefensible in morals and violative of every principle of international law that should govern enlightened peoples.

In passing, let me say that the president of this corporation is the former Alien Property Custodian—the same person who seized the patents and who sold them to the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), and the general counsel of this company, who received thousands of dollars for his lobbying activities in behalf of the dye monopoly, is the same person who was one of the attorneys for the Alien Property Custodian and who aided in the formation of the Chemical Foundation and in bringing about the sale and transfer to it of the confiscated German patents. I might also add that the patent attorney of the Chemical Foundation was a member of the staff of the Alien Property Custodian's office. It is planned by the Chemical Foundation (Inc.) to prevent any infringement of these patents and in this manner deprive the German nationals not only of their patents, but of any possibility of manufacturing for sale in the United States any of the dyes, the formulæ of which are embraced within these patents.

The Chemical Foundation is a creature of the dye monopoly, and the latter uses its patents for its own purposes. It uses the Chemical Foundation and the Dyes Institute, which I shall refer to later, as a cloak behind which to hide its operations and to carry on an extensive and deceptive propaganda throughout the United States in the interest of the domestic manufacturers of dyestuffs.

One or more former Members of Congress and other persons are employed and sent as speakers into all parts of the United States to advocate an embargo and to speak in behalf of the dye monopoly. These speakers intrude themselves into gatherings and conferences and associations of various kinds and in all parts of the United States. They are sent to speak before commercial clubs and chambers of commerce. They are found haranguing Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs. Their seductive voices are heard in women's meetings, in patriotic assemblies, in business gatherings. Quite recently an effort was made to have the American Legion, at its great gathering in Kansas City, adopt a resolution presented by an official of the Alien Property Custodian's Office, to the effect that the Legion approve an embargo upon dyes.

Undoubtedly these multitudinous speakers traversing the United States are paid for their services. Thousands of dollars in expenses and in salaries and compensation are devoted to this method of obtaining indorsements of a program prepared by the dye monopoly and aimed to perpetuate its power.

The Chemical Foundation also paid the expenses of what is known as the chemical exhibit. The purpose of the exhibit was to influence Congress in order that the embargo law might be enacted. The dye monopoly, cooperating with its offspring the Chemical Foundation, has maintained a lobby in Washington for many months. It has paid two of its lobbyists large sums of money. What it paid others will be shown at the proper time. One of the former received considerably more than $50,000, and is devotin much, if not all, of his time to lobbying and to the dissemination of the views of this intriguing and oppressive monopoly.

The Chemical Foundation has recently taken offices in New York. The Daily News Record, under date of August 13, 1921, states that the Chemical Foundation has leased offices for 10 years at an aggregate rental of about $400,000. The news item reads as follows:

> Snowbar & Co. have leased almost the entire twenty-first floor of the Munson Building, at 67 to 75 Wall Street, to Francis P. Garvan, president of the Chemical Foundation, for law and executive offices of the Chemical Foundation. The lease is for 10 years and the aggregate rental is about $400,000.

Francis P. Garvan, as Senators know, was for a considerable period the Alien Property Custodian, and it was under his administration that the Chemical Foundation was organized and the sale made to it of the dye patents to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I should like to state in passing that in my opinion this effort to confiscate the dye patents should be promptly investigated by the Department of Justice and action should be brought to set aside the sale. Our Government can not afford to rest under the cloud of having participated in the theft of property belonging to German nationals. Of course, the Government obtained nothing by the transaction. A pretended sale of the property, which was worth millions, realized but $250,000, and that was not paid to the Government of the United States.

I mentioned the American Dyes Institute; it is a trade organization comprising a majority of the dyestuff manufacturers in the United States. It was organized ostensibly to inaugurate an open-price policy of exchange of information relating to the sales of and prices quoted for dyestuffs among manufacturers of dyestuffs in the United States. Its operations undoubtedly were believed by some of its members to be in restraint of trade and would subject the organization and its members, or both, to the penalties of the Sherman antitrust law.

In the early part of 1919 this institution began an active campaign for the enactment of an embargo or a licensing system on dyestuffs. Attorneys and lobbyists were employed and bills were drafted providing for an embargo and a licensing system. The lobbyists and attorneys besieged Congress in the interest of the measures projected by them. Every effort was made by the institute and its attorneys and lobbyists and officers to secure the embargo referred to. Petitions were circulated, resolutions were procured, supporting the licensing system. Addresses were delivered on the subjects of the embargo or licensing system before clubs, societies, trade associations, and public gatherings in various parts of the United States.

Circulars were sent broadcast throughout the land. Newspapers and periodicals were either subsidized or they were induced to publish an immense amount of material in support of the embargo scheme. Senators will recall that in May of this year the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], upon the floor of the Senate, declared that the Dyes Institute had expended during the calendar year of 1920 more than $104,000 in the campaign to obtain an embargo upon dyes. The books of the institute show that more than $70,000 of this amount was charged to "legislative expenditures." Senators will recall what is known as the Longworth bill. It sought to place an embargo upon dyestuff importations. The lobbyists of the dye corporation were busy in Washington during the consideration of the Longworth bill, and they were most active and aggressive. This bill was forced through the House and reported favorably by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Fortunately it was defeated, largely through the efforts of Senator Thomas, of Colorado. Failing to secure the passage of the Longworth bill, the Chemical Foundation and Dyes Institute and the dye monopoly confederated together and procured an amendment to the emergency tariff bill which gave them substantially the same provisions as were found in the Longworth bill.

The Chemical Foundation has been transmitting through the mails thousands of pamphlets containing arguments in favor of an embargo upon dyestuffs. It has been most active in its campaign for the dye monopoly. The president of the foundation, Mr. Francis P. Garvin, in a speech which was circulated by the foundation by the tens of thousands of copies, indulged in statements which are libelous and were intended to aid the domestic manufacturers of dyes in securing a complete monopoly of the home market. He referred to Senators and Representatives who were opposed to an embargo, and declared that—

> Their voices are the voices of elected Representatives and Senators in the American Congress, but the hands that manipulate them are the hands of the German dye trust, the most powerful monopoly ever formed by man—the Interessen Gemeinschaft, the "I. G."

I will not pause to characterize these libelous and untruthful statements. Mr. Garvin apparently thinks the American people are still at war with Germany and that the dye monopoly can safely masquerade behind a smoke screen of combustible war prejudices. He and the Chemical Foundation and the Dyes Institute, and the members of the dye monopoly, may avow in every city in the land their patriotism and their love of country, and proclaim their altruism and devotion to the material progress of the Nation, but the damning fact still exists that all of them are seeking to prevent competition, to prohibit the importation of dyes into the United States, and to permit the domestic manufacturers to not only charge unjust and extortionate prices for their manufactured products but to secure immunity by executive act or omission or by legislative enactment from prosecution because of their confederating and conspiring together to maintain a monopoly and to plunder the American consumer. These dyestuff manufacturers have in their efforts to secure an embargo not only employed methods to which I have briefly referred but they have attempted to secure the active aid of American business concerns, alleging that they would purchase equipment in order to enlarge their plants, if they could be assured of an embargo. They knew these statements were untrue and that the present facilities for the manufacture of dyes in the United States are sufficient to produce more than the domestic market requires.

I call Senators' attention to another significant fact. In the year 1920, 88,000,000 pounds of coal-tar dyes were produced in the United States; of this amount, 60,000,000 were consumed in the United States and 20,000,000 were exported. The dye monopoly was able to compete in the markets of the world, but yet wanted an embargo to prevent any possible importation into the United States.

The chemists throughout the United States have been misled by the deceptive propaganda of the dye industry and they have been led to add their voices to the discordant volume of monopolistic sound coming from the Dyes Institute, the Chemical Foundation, and the individuals and corporations constituting the dye monopoly. The president of the American Chemical Society was led to send out a letter under date of August 15, 1921, to the members of that organization. He addresses them each as "Dear Fellow Member" and in hysterical and tragic words says that "American chemistry is at stake," meaning that unless the embargo bill is passed so that the dye monopoly may continue its oppressive course, American chemistry will perish. His letter is an insult to the able chemists of the United States. In his circularizing communication he states that "the passage of the dye embargo is vital to your individual interests as well as to the future of the American chemical industry, indeed, the future of American chemistry." He then conjures every member of the society to "do his part to convince Congress," and he urges the members to communicate with "their Senators and Congressmen, urging them to drop all questions of politics and for our common country's prosperity and safety to vote patriotic and vote for the dye embargo." If the American Chemical Society can be prostituted to such an ignoble purpose, then it is time that the official personnel of the organization should be changed. It is a pitiable exhibition to see the President of this great organization lending himself to a propaganda so untruthful, so utterly selfish.

The du Ponts and the big chemical and dye works of the United States have not saved American chemistry. They have sought and obtained millions of profits and they are seeking to continue their monopoly, legalized by law and protected by public opinion formed through misrepresentation and deception. Stamped envelopes addressed to United States Senators have been sent to members of the American Chemical Society, undoubtedly by the president, requesting that they use the same in sending letters to the Senators named, urging the support of the dye embargo. I have in my office a number of such envelopes with the letters inclosed.

The Associated Advertising Clubs of the World apparently have been brought under the baneful influence of the Dye Trust. I have here a special bulletin emanating from this advertising association dated August 19, 1921. It is full of empirical, not to say untruthful, statements and insidious and direct appeals for an embargo. It would seem as if there was no avenue which this intriguing monopoly had not explored in its efforts to compel Congress to pass an embargo law.

I am unable to comprehend the reasons which bring to the support of this scheme honorable men in public life. I can understand and respect the views of Senators who believe that an infant industry may receive reasonable protection for a limited period. I can understand the reasons which might prompt Senators to favor a tariff on dyestuffs, not only for revenue purposes but to protect the domestic dye industry. There are Democrats who would be willing to vote for a reasonable tariff upon imported dyes if they believed that American manufacturers could not otherwise compete with foreign manufacturers, but the dye monopoly refuses a reasonable tariff or a high tariff. It demands an absolute prohibition of importations and also immunity from prosecution for its conspiracies in restraint of trade and its combination to create and maintain a monopoly in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Some time ago I offered a resolution charging that lobbyists and representatives of monopolies and trusts were infesting the Capitol for the purpose of influencing legislation. I demanded an investigation of the activities of the lobbyists and of the corporations that were seeking to promote or to defeat legislation. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate considered the resolution and, much to my regret, reported it back to the Senate limiting the investigation to the dye monopoly and to its activities.

The resolution as reported authorizes a subcommittee to be appointed to make investigations and to subpœna witnesses and to report to the Senate. The resolution, following the usual course, was referred after it was reported to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That committee has reported the resolution back to the Senate and it is now upon the calendar. I shall seek an early opportunity for its consideration. I believe that it will be passed, though I expect persistent and formidable opposition from the lobby maintained by the Dyes Institute and the Chemical Foundation and the dye monopoly.

It is to be hoped that all the facts may be brought to the light of day bearing upon the tortuous and sinuous course of these organizations and of this oppressive and truculent monopoly.

Mr. President, this bill will pass. There are many Senators who will vote for it reluctantly, because of the provisions found therein containing the embargo upon dyestuffs. In my opinion, if the bill before us related only to an embargo upon dyes, it could not pass the Senate. In this I may be in error. It is possible the Republican Party would force it through the Senate. However, I am reassured by the statements of my colleague to which I have referred, and I therefore predict that, with the expiration of the law which it is purposed this day to pass, the dye embargo will cease, and I feel sanguine that when the subcommittee reports back to the Senate the facts which will be brought to its attention concerning the dye monopoly and its parasitic organizations and their activities there will be a revulsion of feeling and Congress will regret that it gave ear to their demands and enacted measures dictated by them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920.

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes.

In connection with the motion I desire to say that if it prevails I will ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside and that to-morrow, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take it up, at which time I shall make an explanation of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

WEDNESDAY, November 9, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, there are times especially when our hearts cry out to Thee as problems multiply and as duties become more exacting, and as we think of coming responsibilities. So in this hour we look unto Thee. Help is our earnest plea this morning, that Thou wilt guide us constantly. Be with the Nation in these coming days, with the sadness that may gather about it, but also with the hope and cheer that is centered continually in its present and in its future. We ask Thy blessing, in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Claims, reported a resolution (S. Res. 170), which was ordered to be placed on the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the bills making appropriation to pay the R. S. Howard Co., of New York City, N. Y., its loss and damage incurred and suffered by it in complying with United States Navy commander order No. N-3255, dated June 18, 1918 (S. 1529); the Acme Die Casting Corporation, of New York City, N. BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 2701) making appropriations for the construction and completion of certain public works on the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri Rivers; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 2702) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask for a change of reference of the bill (S. 979) authorizing the Indian tribes and individual Indians, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington and west of the summit of Cascade Mountains to submit to the Court of Claims certain claims growing out of treaties and otherwise. The bill was referred to the Committee on Claims. Bills of this character heretofore have usually gone to and been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. A similar bill was introduced in recent Congresses and considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I think that is where this bill should go. That committee is especially familiar with Indian matters. Therefore I ask that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

AMENDMENTS OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION BILL.

Mr. KENDRICK and Mr. JONES of New Mexico submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

BUSINESS IN EIGHTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a letter which I have received from the presiding judge of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. It refers to some statistics which I introduced some time ago in connection with the condition of the Federal courts. In the course of the debate the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] gave the Senate some information about the condition of the docket in the eighth judicial circuit. This letter of Judge Sanborn, together with the certificate of the clerk, which accompanies it, throws additional light on the subject, and I think it ought to be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT,
St. Paul, Minn., October 31, 1921.

Hon. SELDON P. SPENCER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SPENCER: Will you permit me to correct an erroneous impression which evidently rests in your mind, and which was expressed by Senator MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, in the inclosed remarks on page 7, to the effect that the Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit is more than two years behind in its work?

Inclosed find a certified statement of the condition of its work on May 1, 1921, made by the clerk of the court. At that time and at the close of the hearing of the cases ready for hearing at each term since 1904 every case not continued over by consent or for cause has been heard and submitted to the court, and each case so submitted has been decided as soon after its hearing as the judges could prepare the opinions after the questions involved had received proper consideration.

For example, during the year 1919 the certificate of the clerk shows that 196 cases were submitted for decision, and on May 1, 1921, the opinions in 192 of them had been handed down and 4 only remained under consideration.

During the year 1920, 191 cases were submitted for opinions, the opinions in 112 were handed down before May 1, 1921, and at that date 79 remained without opinions, but most of these 79 cases had been heard at the December term of 1920, which did not adjourn until some time in April, about two or three weeks before May 1, 1921. This certificate covers the cases submitted and opinions handed down, and many other cases were decided during the respective terms from the bench and without opinions.

So it is that every case ready for hearing has been heard and submitted at the first term at which it was ready, and out of 387 cases which had been heard and submitted for written opinions within two years prior to May 1, 1921, the opinions in 304 had been handed down, only 83 remained without opinions, and all but 15 of these 83 were cases which had been submitted at the December term of 1920, which did not adjourn until within 30 days of May 1, 1921.

In view of this record, you will doubtless agree with me that the court is not over two years behind in its work, and when you consider that there are important and doubtful cases, which sometimes require a rehearing; that judges are human, and sometimes one is ill or dies, I think it is fair to say that this court is and always has been as nearly up to date with its work as the proper consideration of the cases and a preparation of reasonably fair opinions permit it to be. Of course, no one will claim that an appellate court like this can be said to be up with its work only when it has decided every case that has been submitted to it immediately after the submission. Time must be allowed for examination of the authorities and arguments and records, and a conference among the judges after these examinations before the final decision, and after that the opinions must be prepared.

I remain, with kindest regards,

Sincerely, yours,

WALTER H. SANBORN,
Senior Circuit Judge.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, EIGHTH CIRCUIT.

Statement of condition of docket of the court on May 1, 1921, showing number of cases by terms submitted and decided during the two-year period next preceding:

December term, 1919 (convened Dec. 1, 1919), 77 cases submitted; 73 cases decided prior to May 1, 1921.

May term, 1920 (convened May 3, 1920), 59 cases submitted; 54 cases decided prior to May 1, 1921.

September term, 1920 (convened Sept. 6, 1920), 43 cases submitted; 33 cases decided prior to May 1, 1921.

December term, 1920 (convened Dec. 6, 1920), 89 cases submitted; 25 cases decided prior to May 1, 1921.

I, E. E. Koch, clerk of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, do hereby certify that the above statement of the condition of the docket of said court on May 1, 1921, is true as shown by the records of said court.

In testimony whereof I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the seal of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at office in the city of St. Louis, Mo., in the eighth circuit, this 27th day of October, A. D. 1921.

[SEAL.]

E. E. KOCH,
Clerk of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. SPENCER. I also request that there be printed in the RECORD a written statement in connection with the same general subject of the Federal judiciary in regard to the salaries which the judges of the highest courts of the several States of the United States are now receiving, and a comparative table as to the salaries which judges in foreign countries are receiving. In connection with legislation about to be presented to the Senate, this will give information of value.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALARIES OF THE JUDGES OF THE HIGHEST COURTS IN THE SEVERAL STATES OF THE UNITED STATES.

RALEIGH, N. C., August 15, 1921.

The cordial reception accorded the monograph "Per capita cost of courts," which was printed by the writer in pamphlet and distributed in March, April, and May, and reprinted in the West Publishing Co.'s Docket for April–May, 1921, has far surpassed the writer's fondest expectations that it would be of value to the profession.

Any compilation to be of service must, like an almanac, be brought down to date, as it is the present in which we live. In the hopes that this addendum may serve that purpose it has been prepared, as the figures given in the monograph were, as of December 1, 1920.

During the year 1921 there were eight State legislatures that acted favorably on salary increases for their supreme courts, which were as follows:

State.	Former salary.	1921 salary.
Pennsylvania	$14,000	$17,500
New York	13,700	17,500
Michigan	7,000	10,000
North Carolina	5,350	6,350
Maine	5,000	6,000
New Hampshire	5,000	6,000
Florida	4,500	5,500
Vermont	4,000	5,000

As the salary of the Court of Appeals (the highest court) in New York is fixed by the constitution the increased salary of $17,500 will not be effective until after it has been ratified by the voters at the general election in the fall of 1922. The other seven increases are by statute, and went into effect immediately.

The salaries now paid the judges of the supreme courts in the 48 States are (as of July 1, 1921), as follows:

Rank.	Salary.	State.
1	$17,500	Pennsylvania (New York constitutional amendment to be voted on fall of 1922).
2	14,000	New Jersey.
3	13,700	New York.
4	12,000	Massachusetts.
5-6	10,000	Illinois and Michigan.
7	9,000	Connecticut.
8-9	8,500	Ohio and Wisconsin.
10-13	8,000	California, Louisiana, Rhode Island, and West Virginia.
14-18	7,500	Delaware, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, and Nebraska.
19-20	7,000	Georgia and Washington.
21	6,800	Maryland.
22-24	6,500	Alabama, Mississippi, and Texas.
25	6,350	North Carolina.
26-33	6,000	Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, and Oklahoma.
34-36	5,500	Florida, North Dakota, and Tennessee.
37-38	5,200	Oregon and Virginia.
39-45	5,000	Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Kentucky, Utah, Vermont, and Wyoming.
46	4,500	South Carolina.
47	4,000	Arkansas.
48	3,000	South Dakota.

FEDERAL JUDGES.

United States Supreme Court	$14,500
Circuit Court of Appeals	8,500
United States District Judges	7,500

ENGLISH JUDICIAL SALARIES.

The lord high chancellor of England receives a salary of $50,000, the lord chief justice of England a salary of $40,000, while the justices of the supreme court of England and Wales and the justices of the King's bench and chancery courts each receive $25,000. Part of this compensation may be due to, and based upon, living expenses in the city of London and the style of living expected of the justices of the highest court of England. However, all of the other English-speaking judges are better paid than the American judges; for instance, the lord president of the court of session of Scotland, $25,000; while the justices receive $18,000. Similarly, the lord high chancellor of Ireland receives $30,000, the lord chief justice, $25,000, and the justices, $20,000. The judges of the King's bench division (the trial court) of Ireland receive $17,500, while the same trial judges in England receive $25,000.

AVERAGE STATE SUPREME COURT SALARY.

The average salary of the 286 State supreme court judges in the United States is now $7,447, as of July 1, 1921. As of December 1, 1920, the 284 State supreme court judges (Idaho supreme bench increased from 3 to 5) averaged $7,185.

* * * * * * *

During the session of 1921 the Legislature of South Dakota increased the expense allowance of their supreme court judges (the salary being a constitutional provision) from $600 to $1,800, it being done by practically unanimous vote, as only one vote was cast against it in the entire legislature.

The Supreme Court of Idaho has been increased from three to five members. The five States now having a supreme court bench of three members are Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, and Wyoming.

The 286 supreme court justices average a bench of 6 to each of the 48 States, the number in the several States varying from 3 to 10, and being as follows:

NUMBER OF STATE SUPREME COURT JUDGES.

New York	10
New Jersey, Oklahoma, and Washington	9
Maine, Maryland, and Michigan	8

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, at the President's conference on unemployment there was a report submitted by the committee on agriculture, one of the committees of that conference. I think it is of sufficient importance to preserve it by having it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask that it may be so printed.

There being no objection, the report was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 13, 1921.

[Adopted unanimously by President's conference on unemployment, Department of Commerce.]

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

This committee represents an industry employing more workers and involving an aggregate investment far greater than in any other industry. This industry provides more than half of the raw materials used in manufactures, furnishes approximately 50 per cent of the gross freight revenue of the railroads, and makes a consumers' market for 40 per cent of all manufactured goods. It is plain that an industry of 13,000,000 workers out of a total of 40,000,000 in all industries, an industry furnishing 40 per cent of the consuming power of the Nation, a basic industry on which all industries and workers depend for food and the raw materials of clothing and many of the other necessities of living, has a powerful and all-pervading influence on unemployment. Every manufacturing, transportation, commercial, and financial enterprise, and every home in the land is vitally interested in the prosperity of agriculture.

There is no acute problem of unemployment in the agricultural industry. On the contrary, this industry is absorbing or at least providing a haven for great numbers of unemployed from the industrial centers. In the face of falling prices and vanishing profits, farmers have maintained their production of food and other raw materials, even when they had no assurance or reasonable hope of receiving for their products a price equal to their production costs.

In instances they have done this on mere subsistence wages. Cotton farmers, for example, have willingly accepted from banks advances of $10 per month with which to pay their laborers, with nothing advanced for the living of their own families. Thanks to this willing and often unprofitable activity on the part of farmers, the Nation now has a great abundance of food products and raw materials for clothing.

The farmers' difficulty and the cause of much of the industrial distress and unemployment in the cities grows out of the fact that the prices received by farmers enables them to buy only about half as many manufactured products at the prices asked as they purchased in normal times.

The purchasing power of the farmer has been so greatly reduced that he is not buying his usual supplies. He can not. In the case of farm implements the purchases have been reduced to one-third of the amount bought in previous years. Many farmers have lost their savings of a lifetime.

The farm population constitutes 40 per cent of the total of the Nation. When farmers do not buy the business of small towns stagnates, manufacturing plants restrict operations or close, as many of them have been forced to do. The larger cities and transportation suffer accordingly.

The farmer can not continue to exist on the present basis. His share is too low or others are receiving too much. A lessened agricultural income has slowed down all lines of business. General prosperity can not return until agriculture, by far our greatest productive industry, resumes normal conditions. In the interest of the great labor-employing industries of the country everything possible should be done to place agriculture on a proper ratio of exchange of products with other industries.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. All prices and all wages should be so adjusted that a normal, reasonable ratio will be established between the incomes of farmers, laborers, manufacturers, and the merchants, in order that the purchasing power of the farmer may be restored, thus hastening the resumption of normal trade, manufacturing, and the employment of labor.

2. Railroad freight rates on commodities transported to and from the farm must be substantially reduced without delay.

3. The prices of materials, farm implements, and supplies must be adjusted to the price level of farm products. Manufacturers and dealers must realize that farmers can not, at present price levels, resume normal buying, and thereby restore normal employment.

4. The aggregate of charges between the farmer and the food consumer are excessive, and the ways should be found to reduce them. In August, 1921, the index of producers' price on beef cattle (as compared with the year 1913) was 91, while the index of wages in meat-packing plants was 186; of freight rates on dressed meat, 214; and the index of retail meat prices varied from 112 to 161.

5. Better credit facilities must be provided for agriculture, which will furnish funds for production and orderly marketing for long periods suited to the requirements of the industry at reasonable rates of interest and without opportunity for the unscrupulous to charge unreasonable commissions, premiums, or brokers' charges. A recent Nation-wide referendum showed that tens of thousands of farmers have been paying 6 to 10 per cent interest plus 2 to 10 per cent brokerage on borrowed money.

6. Exports of agricultural products should be stimulated with the aid of our merchant marine, foreign credits, and by such other proper means and encouragements as will aid foreign commerce.

7. Any tariff legislation which may be enacted should develop and maintain a just economic balance between agriculture and other industries and treat fairly both producers and consumers.

8. History is repeating itself. Previous wars have been followed by periods of depression, which have in turn been followed by prosperity. Prosperity has come with the revival of agriculture, which has provided an expanding domestic market for manufactured products, thus restoring industrial activity, with the employment of all classes of labor. This course of events is inevitable. We can only hasten or retard its progress.

The production of our farms, supplemented by raw materials from the mines, can provide the subsistence which will enable all industry to prosper. The adjustment will be hastened by the honest cooperation of all intelligent and thoughtful people. One of the chief factors will be the renewal and promotion of habits of industry and thrift by citizens and by the Government.

The chief of all factors to hasten readjustment will be an earnest purpose throughout the whole Nation to take only what is fair and to assist others to win what they are justly entitled to have.

Mr. KENYON. I also ask, in connection with the matter just presented, that there may be printed in the RECORD an article from the Iowa Homestead entitled "What 'getting back to normalcy' means." It relates to agricultural questions and is a very short article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Iowa Homestead, July 28, 1921.]

WHAT "GETTING BACK TO NORMALCY" MEANS—ABLE EXPOSITION OF PRINCIPLES UNDERLYING EXPANSION AND CONTRACTION OF CREDITS.

(By E. C. French, Ottumwa, Iowa.)

During the past season Iowa will have produced and contributed more to the material wealth of our country and the world than ever before. Further than that she will probably have produced and contributed more than any other single political division, area of territory and population considered.

If all the wealth produced during the past season could be fairly distributed on the basis of wealth produced the people of Iowa would most likely receive a larger share than any other people of the world and certainly a very much larger share than the average.

This should indicate for all classes of people in Iowa a greater prosperity than ever before. But instead of a greater prosperity Iowa, along with other agricultural sections, is to sustain an actual loss equal to, if not in excess of, all the profits accruing to such sections from the crops of the two years immediately preceding.

Yet there will be no loss to the country, no loss to the world as a whole. Very great profits will flow from the vast store of wealth that the farmers have produced and very great profits will accrue to others through the transportation and distribution of what these farmers have produced. Others will gain what the farmers are losing. The people who produce the commodities of which the world stands in greatest need, however, have produced them at a loss. People may widely differ as to the causes responsible for this condition, but that the condition itself exists is beyond controversy.

If it be conceded that money and credits constitute the lifeblood of a nation commercially, then it would naturally follow that the forces having control over the money and credits have absolute control of the country's business activities. Having the power to expand or withhold credits, those forces produce either a condition of prosperity or a condition of stagnation, as best suits their purpose. The control over money and credits was exercised during the World War to expand credits and inflate the money of the country. This means made possible the financing of the war with ease and with slight, if any, interruption of business. It is hard to explain why the same forces that financed the most gigantic war in the history of the world without seriously interrupting business could not, in time of peace and during the period of reconstruction, have invoked the same power to save the country from present conditions and thereby performed a great and patriotic service to humanity.

Instead of this a condition has been brought about by the contraction of credits which, in effect, amounts to a repudiation of all the principles of justice and equity by more than doubling the indebtedness of the country as it relates to the farmer. This condition is brought about by reducing by more than one-half his power to pay.

In his inaugural address President Harding asserted that "no civilization could survive repudiation." If this be true, then surely our civilization is imperiled, for there is a much greater injustice in being compelled to pay more than double what one justly owes than by a refusal to pay altogether. Either, of course, is wrong and indefensible, whether brought about under the pretense of getting back to normal or whether brought about under any other pretext.

Inflation worked a great injustice to many, but brought prosperity for the masses. Deflation has brought stagnation to the whole country and ruin and bankruptcy to thousands of our people. Inflation was considered necessary to the financing of the war and covered a period of several years. Adjustments were made from time to time to meet the changing conditions, and thus comparatively few sustained losses that they were not able to bear. The country was kept on a fairly even balance, considering the world-wide chaotic conditions prevailing during that time. The great mass of the people were much more prosperous than ever before. They were not only buying at high prices everything that could be produced, but they were paying their bills with greater ease. All, or at least most, of our business activities had been adjusted on the basis of the higher level of prices.

Railroad rates were the last thing adjusted, this last adjustment having been the second affecting them. Immediately upon these rates being adjusted, other prices began declining rapidly. Most everything else was, using a common phrase, on the toboggan, but railroad rates were carefully fixed on the basis of high prices. And they remained arbitrarily held there by legislative action. It is now apparent to all why rates were somewhat expeditiously, not to say hastily, raised at the time they were adjusted. It must be known to all that the country never would have stood for such rates, as other prices had started to decline. These rates were fixed and adjusted to balance with $1.50 corn and the grossest extravagance it was possible to exercise in the operating expenses while the Government was paying the bill. These rates were a necessary part of the machinery to be put in operation to help absorb the surplus earnings of the people, and almost immediately after the rate-making machine had completed its work the rapid decline in the price of everything else began.

He must, indeed, be a credulous man who would conclude that the fixing of these rates before the onslaught upon other prices, under the pretext of getting back to normal and prewar prices, was wholly accidental. This "getting back to normalcy" was popularized under the pretext that it was necessary in the interest of the masses, but the care and caution exercised to exempt one of the principal items of the cost of living, transportation rates, discloses the sort of propaganda by which the people were deceived into cooperating with those who sought purely selfish ends without reference to how it affected the people.

Both public and private indebtedness at this time have reached a figure which we could never have conceived a few years ago. Probably 90 per cent of this indebtedness, both public and private, was contracted on the basis of the high level of prices prevailing during and immediately after the war. This being true, it must appear utterly absurd to imagine that prewar prices would bring the country back to normal conditions. We may get back to prewar prices. We may reach this sort of "normalcy," and the farmers have already reached or nearly reached that point, but it will be such a normal condition as will compel the farmer to pay two or more bushels of wheat or corn for debts, interest, taxes, and railroad rates where such debts, interest, and charges were contracted on the basis of one bushel of wheat or corn. But, in my judgment, it is hardly the "normalcy" over which the farmer enthused during the last campaign. If the farmers desired a "normalcy" whereby it took 2 bushels of corn to pay debts contracted on the basis of 1 bushel, 2 bushels of wheat to pay interest formerly paid with 1 bushel, 2 pounds of pork to pay the railroad rates formerly paid with 1 pound, then they have what they desired. I am inclined to think, however, that a close inspection of "getting back to normalcy" discloses that, as usual, the farmer has been induced to purchase a very thin-coated gold brick.

Our Government borrowed twenty-four billions of 40-cent dollars to help pay the expenses of the World War. These $24,000,000,000 at the time represented a real value equivalent to not more than 12,000,000,000 bushels of wheat, 20,000,000,000 bushels of corn or 6,000,000,000 days' work for common labor. This survey of the matter will furnish something near a correct idea of the real value the Government received for the twenty-four billions of bonds representing its indebtedness. Deflation has increased the burden of this debt so that it now represents a value equal to 50,000,000,000 bushels of corn and other farm products in the same proportion. This debt, with the interest being a fixed charge, will continue to remain a double burden to be borne by the producing classes for years to come. We will not be required to pay with more dollars but with larger dollars, or with dollars that will require double the effort to secure. The money value which by deflation has been squeezed out of the farmers' corn and other products has been injected into the security holdings, bonds, and mortgages. Deflation may be compared to the transfusion of blood. None of the blood is lost in the operation, but following the operation the producer of the blood no longer possesses it. Ingeniously it has been transferred to the other party to the operation.

Under deflation Iowa farmers are feeding all New England and other Eastern States with breadstuffs and meats inspected by the Government and at prewar prices. They are receiving therefor manufactured products at an inflated value of nearly 100 per cent above prewar prices. And aside from this the products which they receive are inferior in value to those produced before the war. The farmer gives two units of value in foodstuffs and receives in return one unit of value in manufactured products. Deflation has made the creditors' dollars twice as big and the debtors' dollars twice as hard to acquire. The dollar bought with 3 bushels of corn will pay no more debt, interest, taxes, transportation, and other fixed charges than the dollar bought with 3 pecks of the same stuff. When it is remembered that Iowa depends very largely upon her corn to secure the dollars with which to pay these charges, it is seen how seriously and ruinously this condition operates upon the people of our State. The 1919 corn crop of Iowa had a debt-paying value of $500,000,000. "Getting back to normalcy" has reduced the debt-paying value of the much larger crop of 1920 to around $200,000,000.

The enormous indebtedness contracted during the war has afforded great financial interests the greatest opportunity for the exploitation of the people that has ever existed in all times. These interests acquired the major portion of the securities representing the indebtedness with cheap dollars or dollars representing small value at the time, and by forcing deflation they are now in a position to compel payment of interest and principal in dollars representing more than double the value of the dollars loaned by them. This will compel the producers of wealth, which includes most of our ex-service men, to work and produce enough more wealth to pay back to the bondholders not only the 40 cents of value which he loaned the Government but an extra 60 cents of value which he never loaned, but which goes to him presumably as a reward for his shrewdness in inducing the producers of the country to demand a return to "normalcy."

Iowa is the center of the most productive spot on the face of the earth. The Almighty performed one-half the labor for the people when He created the soil. The people cultivate this soil, and at the end of the season have double the reward for their efforts that accrue to the efforts of the average toiler. This enables her to withstand a great amount of exploitation and yet survive. Her people, however, for some time to come will be doing business on what may be left after the cream has been taken by others through the methods referred to. She will continue to enrich our country more rapidly than any other locality of like area, but that will avail her own people but little so long as the profits from year to year are being absorbed by others through ingeniously devised methods not generally comprehended.

Iowa, with a square deal, can distance the world in the accumulation of wealth. Taking the last season alone as an example Iowa farmers have suffered a loss the magnitude of which is appalling. The wealth which should legitimately flow from their efforts would have built a city larger than is now contained within her borders. It must be apparent that no general prosperity can be attained under these conditions. It has been said, and it is more apparent now than ever before, that the force which controls the money and credits of the country controls the Nation. Prosperity will again come into the agricultural section whenever the farmer through thorough organization becomes able to command sufficient political influence to have his full share in the shaping of the legislation and in directing the financial policy of the country.

THE SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, Senate resolution 113, which I introduced some weeks ago, is in the hands of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and will be reported out whenever the chairman of that committee is here. He does not appear to be on the floor of the Senate at this time, and as I desire to modify that resolution in some respects, in order to meet conditions as they now exist, I should like to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the information of Senators a modification of the resolution which I shall ask to substitute for it when the resolution is called up, as I hope to be able to call it up at the next session of the Senate when we have a morning hour for the transaction of business.

Mr. LODGE rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I just add, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, that I stated on yesterday I would call up this resolution for action to-day, but, as the resolution is in the hands of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and the chairman of that committee is not present, and, as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has requested me not to call up the resolution to-day, and, as I desire to modify the resolution in the particulars covered by the amended resolution which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, I have decided not to call up the resolution until the next meeting of the Senate when we have a morning hour for the transaction of business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute resolution now presented by the Senator from Wisconsin will be printed in the RECORD.

The proposed substitute is as follows:

Amendment, in the nature of a substitute, intended to be proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the resolution (S. Res. 113) directing the Committee on Commerce to make investigation into the controversy and the causes thereof between the United States Shipping Board and the men employed on its ships and between the men and private owners of American ships, viz:

"Whereas it has been publicly charged that there is an insidious campaign by foreign interests to destroy the American merchant marine; and

"Whereas the International Mercantile Marine Co., the largest American shipping company, is controlled by the British Government through its contracts and agreements; and

"Whereas the Shipping Board is now and has for more than three years been considering the development of an American merchant marine with said International Mercantile Marine Co. as a nucleus; and

"Whereas certain American railroads have entered into agreements with foreign shipping companies which appear to be detrimental to American interests; and

"Whereas the continued disorganization of our merchant marine must result in closing foreign markets to our agricultural and other products, except as they may be carried in foreign ships upon terms dictated by foreign rivals, a situation which menaces the interests of all classes of our people; and

"Whereas evidence has been presented to the Senate of excessive and unwarranted settlements of claims against the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation; and

"Whereas grave charges against the policy and efficiency of the management of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation and of the public business and the property committed to their care have been made in the press and in the public debate in the United States Senate; and

"Whereas specific charges of fraud and corruption in connection with the operation and disposal of the properties controlled by the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation have repeatedly been made in the public press and before the Senate: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby authorized and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation into the conditions existing in the marine service of this country on both publicly and privately owned ships, and that said committee thoroughly investigate the policies, methods, and practices of said Shipping Board including the relations of the subordinates and executive officers of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation to domestic and foreign shipping and shipbuilding interests and corporations, the transfer of power and authority by the Shipping Board to the Emergency Fleet Corporation, the contracts entered into or under consideration for the operation of vessels and their repair and maintenance, the procedure and practices adopted for the settlement of claims, the sale and liquidation of properties; its attitude toward marine workers and their organizations, and the agreements, understandings, and relations, if any exist, between the shipowners or operators in the United States, including said Shipping Board and all associations of shipowners among themselves, and with the shipowners or operators or associations thereof in other countries, and any control or attempt to control the shipping interests or business of this country, or any portion thereof, or the regulation thereof, by any foreign interest, concerns, or influences whatsoever, including contracts with American railroads, and report its findings and conclusions thereon to the Senate with all convenient speed.

"The said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpœnas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpœnas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning I presented a modified form of a resolution which is not on the calendar—it is in the hands of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate—and asked to have it printed in the RECORD. I intend to offer it as an amendment to that resolution, somewhat in the nature of a substitute for it. I ask to have it printed in regular resolution form in order that it may be on the desks of Members when it is called up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ADJOURNMENTS OVER THURSDAY AND SATURDAY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 10 minutes past 8 o'clock on Friday morning; that we shall then proceed immediately to the Rotunda, there to join the procession to Arlington; and that when on Friday the Senate adjourns, in order to enable it to participate in the ceremonies which are to be held, it adjourn until Monday at the usual hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if his motion contemplates that when we adjourn to-day we shall adjourn until Monday?

Mr. LODGE. Under my motion, when we adjourn to-day we shall adjourn to meet on Friday at 10 minutes past 8 o'clock a. m. Then, to enable it to take part in the ceremonies on that day, the Senate will adjourn immediately until Monday at the usual hour.

Mr. OVERMAN. There has been read at the Secretary's desk an invitation to the Senate to be present at the first meeting of the disarmament conference. I desire to ask if it is contemplated that the Senate shall go in a body on that occasion, or that Senators shall go individually? Have any arrangements been made as to the order of procedure?

Mr. LODGE. There have been set apart at the first session of the disarmament conference a sufficient number of seats for the entire Senate. Senators will simply go there, and the Sergeant at Arms and the officers of the Senate will be there to see that Senators are placed and that seats are provided for them, but there will be no tickets of admission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Am I to understand that we shall stand adjourned from to-morrow until Saturday?

Mr. LODGE. My motion was that when we adjourn to-day, we should meet at 8.10 o'clock on Friday morning, and when we adjourn on Friday it be to meet at 12 o'clock Monday morning. Of course, the meeting on Friday will be simply in order that the Senate may march out of its Chamber to the Rotunda.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. CUMMINS obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia will state it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Would it be in order if I should now ask unanimous consent to take up a resolution which I introduced and which is now lying on the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A request for unanimous consent is always in order, but the Chair has recognized the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. CUMMINS. I rose to make a statement. Yesterday I suggested that at the close of morning business to-day I should ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of what is known as the railroad bill. There are, however, many Senators who are interested in business on the calendar, and at the request of some of them I have concluded that I shall not ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the railroad bill until it would naturally come before the Senate at 2 o'clock. I do this in order to enable the calendar to be called, there being many bills upon it which I assume will not be objected to and which may therefore be considered. The railroad bill will come up at 2 o'clock or before that time if the call of the calendar shall be earlier concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that a request such as he has indicated will now be in order.

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary read Senate resolution 162, and that the Senate then proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 162) which was submitted by Mr. WATSON of Georgia on October 20 (calendar day, October 26, 1921), as follows:

Whereas the United States Government is at peace with Germany and her allies; and

Whereas many persons are now serving sentences in the Federal prisons of this country for alleged violations of the espionage act, one of the war laws enacted by the American Congress during the late war; and

Whereas all powers, the United States excepted, engaged in said World War have freed their political prisoners: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President is requested to grant freedom to all persons convicted during the war upon charges of alleged violations of said espionage laws and to restore to said persons all civil and political rights.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to know if the resolution has been considered by any committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, on this the eve of Armistice Day, I serve notice on the Senator from Kansas that there will be no more unanimous-consent agreements in the Senate.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 279, being the bill (S. 2135) to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask, Can we not take up the calendar in regular order and proceed with the consideration of unobjected bills?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state the reason for my motion. The bill to which I have referred, as its title indicates, is to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes. There was some discussion of this question the other day and some intimations of unnecessary delay. As we all think now that it ought not to be further delayed, if, indeed, there has been any delay, I can see no reason why we should not take it up and pass it immediately. For that reason I make the motion in order that we may dispose of it and settle the matter of the adjustment of our foreign loans.

Mr. FLETCHER. We can not dispose of the bill without considerable debate.

Mr. McKELLAR. We can not dispose of it to-day. It is a matter of too much importance to be disposed of in a few moments.

Mr. McCUMBER. We might make some headway on it. If it is too liberal and it needs any restriction, I do not think there would be any difficulty in arriving at an agreement as to what restrictions are proper, and possibly passing it before 2 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think we ought to go on with the calendar. We have not had a calendar day for a month or more, and there are many bills on the calendar which have been reported by committees and have been pending for some time that could be considered and passed without any objection. It seems to me that we ought to deal with the calendar and not take up at this time a measure which is bound to lead to considerable debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, ordinarily that would be true, but a measure involving an indebtedness of $10,000,000,000, which has not been settled, and the interest upon which we shall need not only for present purposes but especially if we are to pass the soldiers' compensation bill in a short time, I think is so supremely important that we ought to consider and dispose of it before taking up any other matters in the morning hour.

Mr. President, let us realize the fact that the railroad bill——

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill before 2 o'clock is not debatable.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that, but the Senators have debated it upon the other side, and that was the reason I felt that I was called upon to explain my motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The debate can only proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to defer the motion. The bill referred to is a bill of extraordinary importance in the minds of some of us, and it will be debated at length. I know of a number of Senators who desire to present their views upon it. It is most unfortunate to bring it up in this sort of fashion, and I do hope the Senator will not press his motion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I believe that there will not be the necessity for debate which the Senator thinks there will be. As I have suggested, if there needs to be any restriction placed in the bill as it passed the House, I have an idea we would have little difficulty in determining upon the amendments that ought to be made. My idea was to make some progress with the measure, because the railroad bill is coming on and that will take up perhaps all the time, and recesses will be taken probably during its consideration, which will do away with the morning hour. It is very important that we enact the pending funding bill or some similar legislation as quickly as possible.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I am just as anxious as he is that the measure to which he has referred shall be considered, but I want to assure the Senator that it can not be taken up and disposed of in the morning hour; it is going to lead to a great deal of debate. We ought to thrash it out all along the line and be certain that the measure which shall finally pass will be adequate to meet the situation in all respects. I hope the Senator will not insist on his motion in reference to this bill this morning. I will say to him that at the very earliest possible time when we can give it that consideration which it merits—and as there are $11,000,000,000 of indebtedness involved we certainly ought to give it careful consideration—I am willing to join him and help him in every possible way in getting consideration of the measure, but I do not think it ought to be taken up in the morning hour; it is not the kind of a bill that ought to be taken up and considered in the morning hour.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, at the earnest request of the two Senators and others, I will not insist on the motion this morning, but I do not want Senators to accuse me of not attempting to press this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. We will give the Senator entire credit for having made the motion this morning.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we have neglected it too long in the past. We ought to pass it, and I see no other way of making headway than by considering it in the morning hour if the railroad bill is going to be proceeded with.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, of course there are some bills which can be taken up without any serious opposition to them and considered and disposed of in the morning hour. I see no reason why this bill should not have consideration; but there are a very large number of Senators, including a great many on this side of the Chamber, who are entirely opposed to the bill as it now stands. There is no question that it could not be disposed of in the morning hour, and I do not think we ought to attempt to dispose of it in the morning hour. I think it would only delay final consideration, and I hope the Senator will allow the bill to stay on the calendar until it can be taken up as the unfinished business and we can give it deliberate and serious consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the bill can be so amended that it will be satisfactory to the other side, and in a very short time; but what I want is action, and if the Senator will help us bring this matter to a focus as quickly as possible—and I understand that that is the sentiment—I will withdraw at the present time my motion to take up the bill.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we are going to take up the calendar under Rule VIII, I suggest the absence of a quorum, so that Senators may be present.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is absent on official business.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] has been called home on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 384) to require judges appointed under authority of the United States to devote their entire time to the duties of a judge.

Mr. KENYON. Is this the so-called Landis bill?

SEVERAL SENATORS. It is.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], I know, is opposed to the bill coming up. I will ask to have it go over for that reason.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], who introduced the bill, is not here, so I think it had better go over.

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection to it myself, but I know that the Senator from Minnesota is opposed to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 214) to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1016) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States" was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will say that we have already passed a bill repealing this section of the Revised Statutes so far as it relates to payments for service in the Army of the United States prior to April 13, 1861. This bill simply extends it to persons who served in the Navy and Marine Corps, and gives them the same privileges that we have given to persons who served in the Army. There are only a few of them left.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On request the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1375) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I did not hear the objection.

Mr. KING. I objected.

Mr. SPENCER. I wonder if the Senator would like to look further into the bill, or whether I could make a statement about it now. The bill has been on the calendar for a long while, and it really ought to be considered by the Senate if any bills on the calendar are to be considered this morning. Of course, I do not want to hasten the Senator.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator that if he will allow the bill to go over until the next calendar day, I shall look into it and confer with the Senator regarding it.

Mr. SPENCER. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, my recollection is that that bill was supplanted by another bill, and I ask that it be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1829) for the relief of Walter Runke was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there are some poor people in the District of Columbia who can not afford to pay 6 per cent interest on their loans and there are some good Christian people who want to charge them 24 per cent a year. The bill is fathered by the pawnbrokers and a few others. I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 496) for the relief of George A. Robertson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask that that bill may go over until I can get some more information on the subject. It will require debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SCHOONER "CHARLOTTE W. MILLER."

The bill (S. 1063) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller was announced as next in order, and was read.

Mr. KING. I would like to have some Senator inform me whether this is a suit for damages growing out of a collision where the alleged defaulting boat belonged to the United States or belonged to the Shipping Board. If it belonged to the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation, it occurs to me that the suit should be brought against the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation rather than against the United States. I notice that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] reported the bill, and perhaps he is familiar enough with it to give that information.

Mr. SMOOT. There is another provision in the bill which must come out in order to make it conform to bills of a similar character which have already been passed, and I therefore ask that the bill may go over at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FISCAL SYSTEM OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, Senate bill 205 was called up, evidently, while I was out of the Chamber for just a moment. It is a bill relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia. I desire to state that when we reach it on the calendar at another time I shall hope to get action upon it. I am inclined to think it can be passed without very much delay; but if it should be necessary, I shall move to take it up, notwithstanding any objection which may be made. I give this notice so that those who are interested in the bill may understand the situation.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 1856) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 48) authorizing retirement as warrant officers of certain Army field clerks and field clerks Quartermaster Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 405) for the relief of Harold Kernan was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It is a well-known principle that due care must be taken of money in the hands of a bank or a cashier or an Army officer. There ought to be some explanation given as to why this money was lost and how it was lost.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Georgia ask that the bill go over?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do.

Mr. KING. I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1281) for the relief of Capt. Edward T. Hartmann, United States Army, and others, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I think the Senate ought to have an explanation of that bill, and therefore I ask that it be laid over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1541) for the relief of J. P. D. Shiebler was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I would like to have some explanation respecting this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it go over.

Mr. KING. Yes; let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

HERBERT WARREN HARDMAN.

The bill (S. 1880) providing for the appointment of Warrant Officer Herbert Warren Hardman as captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, to take rank under the provisions of section 24a of the act of Congress approved June 4, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], who has charge of the bill, is absent, but I am quite familiar with the circumstances. This is the case of a soldier who enlisted and served in the Spanish-American War, was in the Army for some time, and stood his examination for promotion. The surgeons made a report that he was physically disabled on account of having, as they said, hernia. The man had never heard of such a thing being the matter with him, and upon a reexamination by the same board, they found that a mistake had been made in his case. They certify that a mistake was made, and the War Department report favorably that his record be considered as if that mistake had not been made. That is all there is to it.

Mr. KING. Let me inquire of the Senator whether, if the bill shall pass and he receives a promotion, it will not automatically promote hundreds who may be in advance of him?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all. If he shall be promoted under the law, he will take rank under the provisions of section 24a of the act of June 4, 1920.

Mr. KING. With that explanation, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what section 24a of the act of June 4, 1920, provides, and I do not see anything in the report to indicate. There is always something back of cases of promotion like this and we can not tell how many of like character are to follow in the future.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the surgeons of the United States themselves made a mistake in an examination, which they afterwards admit having made, and as a result of such mistake a man is not allowed a promotion to which he was otherwise entitled, is it not as little as the Government can do to correct the error and put him in the same status as if it had not occurred? That is all this bill would do. The same board which examined the man in the first instance examined him again, and said that the first report as to his physical condition was erroneous. The report of the first examination alone stood in the way of the promotion to which he was otherwise entitled. The bill simply provides that the man shall have the rights to which he would have been entitled under the law if the original mistake had not been made.

Mr. OVERMAN. Did the board give any reason for making such an error?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; they did not.

Mr. OVERMAN. How many examined him?

Mr. FLETCHER. Four, I think.

Mr. OVERMAN. And on another examination they said they had made an error?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is very strange. Do they not give any reason whatever for having made the error?

Mr. FLETCHER. They do not. Sometimes, I presume, it is a little difficult to determine about those cases; they examine the men hastily, and just let them go; but when it was ascertained what the report was, the officer applied for a reexamination. He was given a reexamination by the same board, and now they say no such condition existed, as they formerly reported.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What stands in the way of his receiving a promotion?

Mr. FLETCHER. The record now shows that he did not receive a promotion because of physical disability. He is still in the service, a warrant officer. He is not disabled at all. He is disabled, according to the records, for the purposes of promotion, but he is not disabled for purposes of service.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why was he given the second examination?

Mr. FLETCHER. Because when he was not given a promotion he began to inquire the reason, and found that there was an adverse report by the surgeons, who reported that he had a physical disability. When that knowledge came to him, he analyzed it, and the report states that although the surgeons found in the first instance that he had hernia, upon a reexamination they found there was no such condition. The same surgeons report now that there is no hernia, and therefore that he is not physically disabled. He has passed the examination and is qualified in every way for promotion, and all the bill seeks to do is to give him a right which he always had, and which he was denied by reason of the erroneous report of the board of surgeons on their first examination.

Mr. SMOOT. The report states:

It appears that on his original examination for a commission the medical board reported that this officer was suffering from inguinal hernia, and it was recommended that he undergo an operation in order that he might fit himself physically for a commission. He later presented himself to the station hospital at Fort Sheridan to undergo the operation, and the medical officers at Fort Sheridan certified that they could find no evidence of hernia whatever.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what this letter states.

Mr. FLETCHER. They found no evidence of hernia whatever, although the report had stated that there was hernia, and that was the reason why he was not promoted at the time he was originally examined.

Mr. SMOOT. When an officer has friends in the Army, they are generally very anxious that he shall receive a promotion——

Mr. FLETCHER. There is no such feature in this case. It is not a question of friendship at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I am always suspicious of such cases. But evidently, from what the Secretary of War says, there was a mistake. I doubt very much whether the medical officers of the War Department would now admit that there was a mistake, but I shall not object to this particular case being acted upon favorably at this time.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is only an act of justice that it should be done.

Mr. SMOOT. More than likely, if we had time to make a thorough examination of this case, we might find something which we do not see on the face of the report; but, as I said, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out the words "said officer (who was formerly major, Quartermaster Corps)," and to insert the words "Herbert Warren Hardman, formerly a major, Quartermaster Corps"; and, on page 2, line 1, to strike out the words "to take rank under the provisions of section 24a of the act of Congress approved June 4, 1920," and to insert the words "to date from July 1, 1920, and to be placed on the promotion list in such place as is provided by section 24a of the act of June 4, 1920, for persons appointed as captains under the provisions of section 24 of said act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint Herbert Warren Hardman, formerly a major, Quartermaster Corps, a captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, to date from July 1, 1920, and to be placed on the promotion list in such place as is provided by section 24a of the act of June 4, 1920, for persons appointed as captains under the provisions of section 24 of said act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the passage of the bill a moment; I want to see it passed; but I think really we ought to add an amendment to provide for an examination of the examining board.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think so, too.

Mr. REED. I hope the bill will pass. I shall not offer the amendment, because it might delay the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The committee reported an amendment to strike out the preamble, which was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, the title was amended so as to read: "A bill providing for the appointment of Warrant Officer Herbert Warren Hardman as captain in the Quartermaster Corps, United States Army."

SCHOONER "CHARLOTTE W. MILLER."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the question which the Senator from Utah asked me in regard to the bill (S. 1063) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller I can now answer. It merely provides for sending to the Court of Claims the question of the payment of damages resulting from a collision between a schooner and a United States vessel. I wish to say to the Senator that the vessel of the United States was a naval vessel. It was the U. S. S. D-2, which ran into the schooner. The Secretary of the Navy reported to the Committee on Claims and said that in his judgment the matter ought properly to go to the Court of Claims for adjudication. That is all that the bill provides. Therefore, if there is no objection, having answered the Senator from Utah, I hope he will allow the bill to be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I notice on page 2 of the bill it authorizes that a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, shall be entered. In all such bills, that has not been done. They have been referred to the court merely for findings of fact and to report the amount. Then the bills are presented in their regular order for payment through appropriations that may be made. All of them have been objected to which contained this clause, and it has always been agreed that the bills should follow this course which I am suggesting. Therefore, I shall have to object to having the bill taken up at this time.

Mr. GERRY. If the bill is amended in conformity with the statement of the Senator from Utah, would he object to it?

Mr. SMOOT. I would have no objection then and would let it pass. We can strike out that clause and pass it as we have passed similar bills.

Mr. SPENCER. There is no provision in this bill to provide for payment.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; but it provides that the Court of Claims shall enter judgment and decree for the amount of such damages and cost. What we want is the finding of facts in the case. If the Senator will let it go over, we can agree upon an amendment to cover that point as we have done in the case of former bills, and then I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator will simply agree to strike out the words "and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the said schooner Charlotte W. Miller, or against the owners of said schooner Charlotte W. Miller, in favor of the United States," I believe that would answer his objection.

Mr. SMOOT. That is about what I would suggest to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me it is all right as it is worded. The finding of the Court of Claims would come back here and Congress would have to act upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, and that is the way it has been done.

Mr. NELSON. To submit a case to the Court of Claims like this is perfectly proper. This is the case of a collision where it seems to me the court ought to render final judgment.

Mr. SMOOT. There were over 20 such cases passed on at the last session of Congress, and every Congress has considered similar bills. This bill is not in conformity with the rule which has been adopted. All I care about is to follow the plan which has been adopted in the past.

Mr. NELSON. I do not think it has been followed in every case.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been followed in every case I know about.

Mr. GERRY. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the bill was passed through the Senate at a previous session worded just as it is now.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think so.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Rhode Island is correct, and the bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Claims of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, I will say I was not here when the bill was passed. The Senator from Missouri knows that all the cases which have been passed on here, where there has been any discussion had upon them, have not been so worded as to allow a judgment or decree by the court against the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. My recollection is not the same as that of the Senator from Utah. The objection which the Senator from Utah had some time ago and which I think was well founded was concerning the provision for the payment of the claim. What difference does it make whether the Court of Claims makes a finding of fact and an ascertainment of the amount, or whether it enters judgment, because the judgment is not enforceable? The judgment can not be paid. It is nothing more than a report to Congress of the amount. There is no provision for its payment, and Congress must then appropriate the amount of the judgment if it is to be paid.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over until I can get a copy of other bills and strike out exactly what was stricken out in those.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is not before the Senate.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2040) to provide for compulsory school attendance of children, to provide for the taking of a school census, to create the department of school attendance and work permits for the administration of this act and the act to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, within the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

The bill (S. 32) for the relief of contractors, subcontractors, and material men who have suffered loss by reason of Government orders was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. That ought to go over.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 2170) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That bill will take a good deal of time. There are many meritorious features in it, but it would be impossible for us during the morning hour to give it the attention which its merits require. Let it go over on that account.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The bill (S. 150) to provide longevity pay for reserve officers and National Guard officers serving under orders of the War Department was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over.

JOHN LYONS.

The bill (S. 943) for the relief of John Lyons was next in order, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, John Lyons, who was a private in Company E, Forty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Reserving the right to object, I would inquire in what war the soldier served?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He served in the Civil War.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is too long ago. I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator to reserve his objection until I can make a short explanation of the case.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This is the case of a boy who enlisted in March, 1864, at the age of 16 years in order to serve his country. He served faithfully for an entire year and was then granted a furlough of 15 days in order to return to his home to give attention to the sale of a stock of goods. He did not return at the expiration of the 15 days because he had not disposed of the stock of goods. He finally, within a few days thereafter, did dispose of the stock of goods. In the meantime Lee's army surrendered and the war was over. He was only 16 years old and thought that it was not necessary to return to his command, and he has had this charge resting upon him ever since.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is sufficient. As an ex-Confederate, or the son of one, I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that was over 50 years ago. I believe I shall object.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me say to the Senator that the fact it has been a long time does not make it any less meritorious.

Mr. OVERMAN. I used to be on that committee and I know about such cases. What does the department say about it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The department said, in a letter which is filed with the report, that it has no objection to the passage of the bill. This case is not covered by the general provisions of the law where in certain specific cases the department can remove disability by reason of a charge of desertion. They have gone into the case thoroughly and interpose no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall object for the present. I do not see why he should come here 50 years after the event, having waited all this time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that a similar bill has been passed by the Senate at a previous Congress, but it was not passed by the House. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will look into the report.

Mr. REED. Let me ask for information. Does the bill carry a pension?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It carries no pension or back pay or bounty or anything of the kind. The usual provision to that effect is inserted at the end of the bill.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator willing to add a clause that no pension shall be granted?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not desire to deprive the beneficiary of the bill of any just and proper right to which he might be entitled by reason of the passage of the measure, but he gets no back pay; he will receive no accumulated pay.

Mr. REED. I understand he went home to dispose of stock on hand?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. REED. How old did the Senator say he was?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He was 16 years of age.

Mr. REED. He must have been pretty young to have been in business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. He was young to be in business, and still younger to be in the service of his country at that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have consistently objected to these cases. I do not believe in a man coming here 50 years after the war is over, a deserter, and bringing proof to show that he ought not to be debarred from certain privileges for that reason. It is too long ago, and the evidence is too far away. I have had to do with such cases. I have objected to them heretofore, and I am going to be consistent. If the Senator from West Virginia can show me that this man ought to receive this relief, I shall be glad to be shown. I shall examine into the case. I shall look at the report. If it is the same as other reports on similar cases, the department have said nothing and the reports amount to nothing. Heretofore the reports have not contained anything of value. They do not know and can not know at this day and time, and they send the facts down only as they have them there. I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator must know that in those armies there were many men who became subject to the technical charge of desertion, but who were not deserters as a matter of fact. There is no reason, merely because of the lapse of 50 years or any other length of time, that that charge should stand against a man who voluntarily went into the Army when he need not to have gone in, who was under the age at which he could have been drafted and under the age at which he was allowed even to volunteer. The fact that there has been a considerable lapse of time is no reason for not removing the charge against him.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to be misunderstood. It was merely a jocular remark that I made. So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to be in the position of opposing the bill. I know nothing about the case. I do say, however, that if the Army took in boys 16 years of age, I have not much to say against the boy of that age who went away and did not come back.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will look into it and examine the evidence and the next time the calendar is called I will announce my decision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

NATIONAL MILITARY PARK AT CHALMETTE, LA.

The bill (H. R. 2232) in reference to a national military park on the Plains of Chalmette, below the city of New Orleans, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, to strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That the expenses of the investigation herein directed to be made shall be paid from the appropriation "Contingencies of the Army."

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to investigate the feasibility of establishing a national military park on the plains of Chalmette, below the city of New Orleans, where was fought on January 8, 1815, the Battle of New Orleans, and to prepare plans of such park and estimate of the cost therefor, and obtain such further information as may enable Congress to act upon the matter after being fully advised.

SEC. 2. That the expenses of the investigation herein directed to be made shall be paid from the appropriation "Contingencies of the Army."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 7158) to amend the Army appropriation act, approved July 11, 1919, so as to release appropriations for the completion of the acquisition of real estate in certain cases and making additional appropriations therefor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who reported that bill, is not present. The bill carries a large appropriation; indeed, so large that I think some time ought to be given to its consideration. I therefore ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1565) making eligible for retirement under the same conditions as now provided for officers of the Regular Army all officers of the United States Army during the World War who have incurred physical disability in line of duty was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1976) to amend the first paragraph of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the salaries of teachers, school officers, and other employees of the board of education of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1906, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that bill go over, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1790) to place national guardsmen who entered the World War otherwise than through the draft on equal basis as to longevity and continuous-service pay with national guardsmen who were drafted was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENTS OF COAST GUARD.

The bill (S. 1975) giving permanent rank to district superintendents of the Coast Guard on the retired list was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that is rather a lengthy bill, although not a very complicated one. It is rather important, but I take it that it can not be disposed of this morning under the unanimous-consent rule. I hope that when we again call the calendar Senators who are interested in the bill may examine it, so that it may be possible to pass it by unanimous consent. If not, then thereafter I shall take the proper steps to try to get it considered when there is ample time for consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Washington has observed I should like to say that I regard the bill to which he refers as very important, and I hope we shall get action on it, for the discrimination in the matter of insurance between American ships and foreign ships is operating now very much to the detriment and injury of American ships, and we can help that situation a very great deal by passing this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad the Senator from Florida has made that statement. The bill is a very important measure, and we hope that it will result in great good if it shall be passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, the bill goes over.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM.

The resolution (S. Res. 115) directing an investigation of the administration of the Federal reserve system and the office of the Comptroller of the Currency was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

The bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMITH. Let that bill go over. It is a matter of importance, and it will lead to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Carolina will agree that that is a bill which should receive consideration, if it is within the possibilties, before this session of Congress is adjourned. There will be some amendments offered to the bill, and, of course, it could not be disposed of this morning; but, Mr. President, there is a very substantial number of Senators who desire the passage of such legislation as is embodied in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that I do not believe there is any bill pending before this body which is of more importance than is this bill, especially under present conditions, and I join with him and other Senators in hoping that before this session is over we may get action on it with the contemplated amendments.

ASSOCIATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS.

The bill (H. R. 2373) to authorize association of producers of agricultural products was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. In the absence of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who reported that bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if that bill is likely to be brought up during the present session of Congress?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

SUGAR FROM ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic was announced as next in order.

Mr. WILLIS. That is rather an important resolution. Anyway, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who introduced the measure, is not present. If taken up, the joint resolution will lead to discussion. I therefore object to its consideration. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2356) for the relief of Clarence L. Reames was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2391) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that is a measure of very great importance, and it could not be disposed of in the morning hour. Futhermore, it is a very proper matter for consideration by the Finance Committee in connection with the tariff bill. I have proposed the bill as an amendment to the tariff bill and have had the amendment referred to the Finance Committee, hoping that they will incorporate it in the tariff bill. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 2228) to amend certain sections of the Judicial Code relating to the Court of Claims was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. The consideration of that bill would take some time. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 2337) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we shall have before us at 2 o'clock, if not sooner, a House bill relating to the railroads. I am not sure whether the bill the title to which has just been stated is pertinent to that measure, but if it relates to the railroads, it is obvious that it will take considerable time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, my impression is that this is almost the identical bill that is now before the Senate as the unfinished business. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] reported this bill, but it is now practically the same as the unfinished business that comes up at 2 o'clock. Therefore I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

LANDS IN FORT GEORGE WRIGHT MILITARY RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 29) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant to Lloyd E. Gandy, of Spokane, Wash., his heirs and assigns, the right to overflow certain lands on the Fort George Wright Military Reservation, at Spokane, Wash., on such terms and conditions with respect to improvements to be made on the present target range as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or in lieu of such improvements to be made on the present target range the Secretary of War may accept a conveyance to the United States of such other lands to be designated by the Secretary of War as may be deemed suitable for a target range in exchange for such overflow lands; that to facilitate the acquisition of the necessary additional lands the Secretary of War is authorized to condemn land necessary and suitable for target-range purposes, such condemnation to be at the expense of said Lloyd E. Gandy, grantee, his heirs and assigns, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, let that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a brief explanation of that measure?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It provides for the transfer of Government land to private individuals, and would seem to require an explanation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, it is a measure which has to do with the overflow of a small portion of land on a military reservation by the erection of a power dam lower down the stream. The reservation is on a high plateau, and the river flows through a deep canyon, so that the amount of land that will be overflowed is very slight. An agreement has been reached between the War Department and the parties who own the dam site lower down the stream for the adjustment of the differences. It is recommended by the Secretary of War; most careful examinations have been made of the property, and no damage will be done which is not provided to be compensated for either by the acquisition of another piece of land for target-practice purposes or else by filling in and adjusting the land where it is overflowed.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Do we get the other land by a dam site?

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the Senator's question?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator says that the land to be acquired is for the purposes of a dam site. I want to know if we will get other land by a dam site?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The land is not by a dam site. The dam site is a considerable distance from the land to be overflowed. I hope the Senator will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the bill merely contemplates that in the erection of a dam by some private persons it is possible that some land owned by the Government and utilized in a military reservation may be overflowed?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. KING. But the overflow of the land will do no damage of any importance?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It will do no damage.

Mr. KING. And for whatever damage is done the owner of the land will make compensation to the Government?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; on terms agreed upon between the Secretary of War and the other parties.

Mr. KING. So that this bill is in the interest of promoting a power scheme for the local advantage of the people?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. KING. And it diminishes some of the military power of the Government; that is, it restricts the control of the Government over some territory?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The proposed improvement will interfere with a small target range.

Mr. KING. Anything that is in the interest of private development I am for. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I will not further object to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. FRANCIS BARRACKS, ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

The bill (S. 2138) providing that the Government property known as the St. Francis Barracks, at St. Augustine, Fla., be donated to the State of Florida for military purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Surely, Mr. President, the Senator will not object to that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Are we going to give all barracks belonging to the Government of the United States to the States in which they are located? Not with my consent.

Mr. FLETCHER. The situation is this: The Government of the United States wants to get rid of those barracks.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, let the Government sell them.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Committee on Military Affairs have reported in favor of this bill and recommend its passage. A board of the War Department has recommended that these particular barracks and some other forts and reservations along the coast are no longer needed for military purposes and they have recommended that they be abandoned. Instead of abandoning them, this bill, which was introduced by my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] and reported unanimously by the Military Affairs Committee, provides that they shall be turned over to the State to be used by the National Guard for military purposes, and it is prescribed in the bill that the barracks must be continued to be used by the National Guard for military purposes; so that the bill reserves the use of the barracks purely for the purposes of the National Guard, which now, as the Senator knows, is a part of our Military Establishment.

Mr. SMOOT. Can the Senator tell me what the land and buildings are worth?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know that they have very much value. They are old barracks that were built a long time ago, and I think the main buildings were burned a few years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. That was not the story when the Government bought the property. I will change my question and ask the Senator does he know what it cost the Government of the United States for the land and the buildings?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not remember. They were acquired fifty-odd years ago or more; I do not know how long ago, but it is an old reservation, dating away back to Spanish times. The main buildings were destroyed by fire years ago. It has been occupied by the National Guard right along continuously for years, with a nominal rental of a dollar a year, or something like that, to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I should not object to that. I should be glad to have the United States let them use the land at a nominal rental of 1 cent, but if we begin now to transfer barracks to the States the Government of the United States will receive nothing from any of them in any part of the United States. I think it is more a question of a precedent than of what the value may be, because I know that there are barracks here that are being abandoned that cost the Government of the United States millions of dollars, and if we give away this one there will not be a single barrack in a single State in the United States that will bring into the Treasury of the United States a dollar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, this property does not bring the Government a dollar now, and has not done so for 50 years. It is an expense on the Government to keep it. They want to get rid of it, and they are going to abandon it. The only thing this bill does, instead of authorizing the War Department to abandon the property, is to authorize its transfer to the State for military purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Government of the United States has held this property for 50 years, and if the Government had not held it the Government would have had to purchase land in Florida during the recent war for this very purpose of a barrack.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I do not think so, because they have Fort Marion there. They have another reservation on Anastasia Island, right across the bay. They have half a dozen reservations in Florida that the military board has reported in favor of abandoning. They say they are no longer wanted for military purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. This property has been owned by the Government for 50 years. How near the center of the town is it?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not very far from the bay. It depends on what you would call the center of St. Augustine. Of course it is not a very large city in the way of distances. I should think probably it may be a quarter of a mile, or something of that sort, from the center of the town.

Mr. SMOOT. It is rather valuable property, however, is it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should not consider it valuable property as it stands now.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator frankly that I am perfectly willing to have this bill changed and let it be used for military purposes at a rental of a dollar a year.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is what the Senator says is being done now.

Mr. FLETCHER. They have been doing that for some time. Now they recommend the entire abandonment of the reservation. The matter has been submitted to the War Department, and the department advises this course, that it be preserved in a way for military uses; and the only way in which it can be preserved for military purposes is to turn it over for the use of the National Guard. It can not be used by the State for other purposes. The State can not sell it; it can not dispose of it; it can only be used by the National Guard for military purposes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Florida to what the War Department actually says about the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I have read it.

Mr. WILLIS. It says:

St. Francis Barracks is one of the reservations included in a list of real estate submitted to the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives as being no longer needed by the War Department and for such disposition as Congress may deem proper.

It does not recommend that this be done.

Mr. FLETCHER. It makes a favorable report.

Mr. WILLIS. What I want to ask the Senator now is, What other property does he know of, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, that is included in that list? His statement is that there is certain property for which the War Department no longer finds need. I am trying to develop whether we want to establish the policy of giving away that property to the several States or selling it.

Mr. FLETCHER. There are a number of reservations in Florida, as I have just said—for instance, old Fort Marion, and a reservation on Anastasia Island, across the bay from this reservation, a reservation down the coast, and three or four other reservations in the State—that the War Department say are no longer needed for military purposes, and they are going to have them disposed of by Congress. Whatever Congress sees fit to do about them will be determined in due course. As to Fort Marion, it has been determined to declare that a national monument, and it has been so declared under the act of 1915, so that Fort Marion is out of the way. It has been declared a national monument instead of a military post, and the Government will take care of it as it takes care of other national monuments. These particular so-called barracks that have been occupied by the National Guard bear the name of barracks, but there is not much to signify that there are any barracks there. That, however, is the name of the reservation. They have been occupied by the National Guard for some years, and the headquarters of the National Guard of the State are located in St. Augustine in these barracks, by arrangement with the Federal Government. This is one of the reservations that the War Department says is no longer needed for military purposes, and it is to be disposed of as Congress may determine.

My colleague and I took up the matter with the War Department—he introduced the bill, and we both had it up with the War Department—and asked them what they would advise. The State authorities desired to know, as long as the War Department were going to abandon these so-called barracks, if they would not be willing to have them turned over to the State for use by the National Guard. The War Department said,

"Yes; that suits us exactly. We recommend that. We should like to have that done. We will make a favorable report on this bill." The Secretary sends a letter to the committee recommending this course, and the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously reports it. It is the wish of the War Department that these reservations, these so-called barracks, be turned over to the States for the use of the National Guard; and that is what this bill provides.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator, I think, is mistaken when he says it is the wish of the War Department. The War Department, in a letter here, say they have no objection. I should like to ask the Senator how many acres there are in this reservation?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have not the exact number of acres. I have a full, detailed description of it, not right here with me, but I have the boundary lines, the location of the whole thing, platted. I have not that here. It is not an acreage proposition, as I understand. There are some lots there. There is not very much property there. The buildings amount practically to nothing.

Mr. SMOOT. It does seem to me that the State of Florida can afford to pay $1 for the use of that property for a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that understanding that the War Department was willing to have this property conveyed to the State for use by the National Guard, the State legislature, which met in April of this year and adjourned in June, appropriated $40,000 for the purpose of putting up buildings on this property and improving it so as to make it suitable for National Guard purposes in case the Government decided to take this action. We have never dreamed that there would be any opposition to it. There is not any in the War Department. They want the thing done. The legislature of Florida made this appropriation of $40,000 to improve it by a suitable building, so that it can be used by the National Guard, and I can not see any possible objection at all to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I can see objections to it. If the Government is going to give lands to one State, or transfer barracks to it, I think the Government ought to give money to other States in order that they may have the same privileges.

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that as far as my own State is concerned there is a reservation there. They did not give the National Guard of the State of Utah the privilege of building upon that reservation ground. They had to go and buy the land, which they have done. In my own home town not only have they bought the land but they have put up buildings, and the State is responsible for every dollar of the money; and I can not see why we should be giving away these barracks. Let us sell them to the States.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator realizes that the National Guard to-day is one of the elements composing the National Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and the National Guard of the State of Utah is situated in exactly the same way.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. SMOOT. The State of Utah buys her own land and puts up her own buildings, and I think that is right.

Mr. FLETCHER. The disposition of the Government is to encourage the National Guard. Of course, they can buy their buildings if necessary; but here is an old so-called barrack, an old reservation which has not been used by the Government at all for years and years, and in order to preserve its military character and make it useful for military purposes by requiring that it shall be used for that purpose in the deed to the State the War Department are willing to turn it over to the State for the use of the National Guard. The State would have to appropriate $40,000, and, as I say, they have already provided that amount in order to put up the buildings on the reservation so as to make it usable.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to find out how many of these barracks there are in the United States that are not wanted for the use of the Army at the present time, and I want to know where they are located, and I want to know what they have cost the Government of the United States; because, just as surely as we live, if this bill becomes a law other bills of the same kind will be introduced here, and this will be pointed to as a precedent, and what are we going to say? Can we object after we allow one bill of this nature to pass Congress and allow this barrack to be given to the city or to the State?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIS. I serve notice on the Senate that if this bill is to be passed and a precedent thereby established, I know of at least one bill that will be here from the city of Columbus, in my State, where there is a great barrack which the Government is proposing to abandon. It is worth a very large sum of money; I would not undertake to say how much. It is located right within the business section of the city. If this policy is to be established, I shall introduce a bill forthwith for the donation of that barrack.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator is only one. I would do exactly the same thing in my State. Senators can not sit here and allow one barrack to be given to a State, and then, knowing that there are abandoned barracks in their own States, never introduce bills for the same purpose. If they did, they would be condemned by their own people.

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the Senator's proposition—that the Government should offer this property at public sale?

Mr. SMOOT. Either that or go along just as it is going, and let the State of Florida pay $1 a year for the use of it. We do not know how soon we shall want this land; and if the Government gives it away now and has to purchase it back a year or two or five or ten years hence, there is no telling what it will have to pay for it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. The buildings on the land are practically of no value at all, and the State would have to erect buildings at considerable expense. Whether the State would be willing to do that on a one-year lease or not, I can not say.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not care how long the lease was. I do not want the Senator to get the idea that I am objecting to the State of Florida using that property. I am not. I am perfectly willing that it shall have the use of the property for a year——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why would it not be satisfactory, perhaps, to the Senator from Florida to accept an amendment to the bill providing that in case the United States should ever require this land for military purposes, it should revert to the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants to do that, I should be glad to have that done.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. We had a case in our State where that was done, and the land has been used for many years as a magnificent park, in the city of Tacoma. It practically owns it. There is no reasonable probability that the United States will ever need it again for military purposes; but under the statute it has the power to take it again for military purposes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I thought I had the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has the floor. The Chair inquired if he yielded to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will yield in just a moment. In answer to the Senator from Washington I will say that I think that would be the effect of the bill as it is framed now, that the property is to be used, as specified in the act, for military purposes, and the moment it ceases to be used for military purposes, I think it would revert to the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There ought to be an express provision to that effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should not object to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I want a little time to get some information in regard to this matter in addition to what is contained in the report. There is only a part of the letter from the War Department quoted, and unless the Senator from Georgia desires to speak on the bill, I shall object.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I want to give some information to the Senator from Utah in regard to this matter. I pass through the city of St. Augustine whenever I go down to Florida, which I do every winter when I can get away. I know it to be a city of very narrow streets; it is an old Spanish town; and from my knowledge of the locality I know that this ground must be immensely valuable. If the people of Florida can not afford to pay $1 a year for it, it seems to me it is not worth giving away.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The resolution (S. Res. 127) to investigate the causes of the factory, wholesale, and retail price conditions in the principal branches of house-furnishing goods, industry, and trade was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2135) to enable the refunding of obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

MELQUIADES SANCHEZ.

The bill (S. 2144) for the relief of Melquiades Sanchez was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. BURSUM. Mr. President, this is a bill to grant a pension to a Civil War veteran, now 81 years of age. If he is to receive it during his lifetime, the bill must be passed in the very near future.

This veteran served three years during the war. The records show that he reenlisted during the war, and he is charged on the records of the War Department with desertion. The evidence before the committee shows that after the war was over the soldier asked for a furlough so that he might go home to see his sick mother, who was dying, some 40 miles from Fort Stanton. He was denied that furlough. He went and saw his mother and came back in about two months, after his organization had disbanded and the war was over. Prior to that time the soldier had served three years and had been granted an honorable discharge. He was under reenlistment at the time he deserted. The bill would simply give him a status, which would entitle him to a pension for his service during the war. For that service he was given an honorable discharge.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I made objection to the consideration of this bill. I shall look into it. I am not satisfied with the report which has been submited by the War Department. As the Senator knows, there are hundreds of bills which have been introduced, perhaps thousands, providing for the reinstatement of men who deserted from the Army, in order that they may get pensions. In such cases the soldiers did not have enough interest in having the charges of desertion removed from their names until recently, though for 50 years or more they had been carried on the records of the Government as deserters. But when they want a pension they are very alert to get the charge of desertion removed. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me call the Senator's attention to a statement or two in the report which attracted my attention. Apparently this man enlisted on October 10, 1861, in a very early part of the war. He was accounted for on all the muster rolls of his company up to December 31, 1865, after the war was practically over. It seems to me that of itself is sufficient to show that he was an honorable soldier, and certainly tends to corroborate the statement as to the cause of his absence.

Mr. SMOOT. He was accounted for up to the 25th of January, 1866.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He was confined in the guardhouse December 31, 1865, which was after the war was over, and you can not wonder that men were anxious to get away at those times. It seems to me that when the record shows that a man served from 1861 until December, 1865, that should be enough to satisfy any Senator that any charge of desertion which may stand against him is really unfounded.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact also that the reason why the department did not remove the disability was because of the provision in the law of March 2, 1889, which prevented the department from acting on cases where the soldier happened to be in a guardhouse. It is evident that the department would have removed this charge had it not been for that express provision of the statute. If the Senator from Utah will look at the bottom of the first page of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and the beginning of the next page, I think he will find there evidence that The Adjutant General would have removed the disability if he had been permitted to do so by the terms of that statute.

This poor soldier, who happened to be in the guardhouse at the time his mother was sick, is now a man 81 years old; he served his country from 1861 to the end of 1865, after the war was over, and I hope the Senator will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall persist in my objection until I ascertain the reason of his being confined in the guardhouse, and a little further as to the cause of his desertion. Obviously he broke away from the prison in which he was confined. He had committed some offense which subjected him to imprisonment, and while in the guardhouse he deserted. Let the matter go over until the next calendar day, and in the meantime I shall be glad to confer with the Senators from New Mexico and ascertain the facts.

Mr. BURSUM. Does not the Senator think that four years of constant, devoted service to the country ought to be sufficient to forgive him for any little violation?

Mr. KING. We will see what the violation was.

Mr. BURSUM. He states under oath that his mother was on her dying bed 40 miles away. Does not the Senator think that he was justified in running away, when they would not give him a leave of absence?

Mr. KING. I persist in my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, it will go over.

DONATION OF ORDNANCE TO THE UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH DAKOTA.

The bill (S. 2249) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate certain obsolete ordnance to the University of South Dakota was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. That should go over without losing its place, because there probably will be a bill offered shortly providing for many such cases. The matter is unsettled yet in the department, and I ask that the bill may go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

REIMPORTATION OF MILITARY SUPPLIES EXPORTED.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 183) imposing a duty of 90 per cent on all goods exported from the United States for the use of the American Expeditionary Forces and its allied forces and which have been sold to any foreign Government or person, when reimported into the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That will certainly bring on discussion, and I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

CONVENTION OF AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF PORT AUTHORITIES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 45) to authorize the President to extend invitations to certain foreign nations to send delegates or representatives to the tenth annual convention of the American Association of Port Authorities was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that convention has been held already. So I ask that the joint resolution may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

RAILROAD OF SPRUCE PRODUCTION CORPORATION.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 90) authorizing the United States Spruce Production Corporation to impose certain conditions on the sale of its railroad in Clallam County, State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert the following:

That the Director of Aircraft Production, as holder of the stock belonging to the United States in the United States Spruce Production Corporation, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to vote said stock in favor of selling the railroad, equipment, and material of said corporation prior to liquidation thereof, and as a condition of such sale he may require of the purchaser that the railroad so sold shall be operated as a common carrier, and that the dissolution of said corporation may be postponed for such time as the Secretary of War may deem necessary in order to effectuate the sale herein authorized.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will make just a brief statement, which I think will satisfy the Senate.

Under the act authorizing the incorporation of this spruce production corporation it is in effect a private corporation of the State of Washington and has authority to dispose of its property. A railroad was constructed out there necessary to get to the timber. It should be sold. The people of our State want the road sold, with a condition attached that it shall be operated as a common carrier, and that, I think, should be done.

The legal department of the office of the Secretary of War hold that they have no right now to insist upon that condition being placed on the sale of the railroad, and it is the purpose of the joint resolution to give them authority, as the holders of the stock, to impose the condition upon any purchaser of the railroad that he shall operate it as a common carrier. I think that should be done.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if the laws of his State do not determine who are and who are not common carriers? Would a restriction in the sale that it should be used as a common carrier be operative as against the statutes of the State, and should the Federal Government attempt to label a corporation as a common carrier which under the laws of the State would not be a common carrier?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not examined our State laws, but the governor of our State was here, though I do not think he came especially in connection with this proposition, and while in the city he went before the Secretary of War and urged that such a condition be imposed. He said that the people of our State would be very much dissatisfied if this railroad were sold unconditionally, so that it could be used purely as a logging road, or for other purely private purposes. I assume from that that there is nothing under the State laws, at least at present, which would impose upon the railroad, if sold, the obligation to be run as a common carrier.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the imposition of the restriction he is asking would depreciate the value of the property, so that the Government could not get what it might obtain if it were sold to private individuals?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am inclined to think that may be true; nevertheless, it would be a great injury to the community and to the State, in the end, if it should be sold solely to private parties, because it would be simply a logging road, and when all the timber was taken off, the road would be absolutely abandoned and they would not have it. It is in rather a desirable section of the country and our people would be very much dissatisfied if it were sold as a purely private road. It is the purpose of the joint resolution to give to the Secretary of War, as the holder of this stock, the right to vote it in favor of this condition. That is the situation.

Mr. KING. Is it intended to compel the Secretary of War to sell only in the event that it is to be used as a common carrier?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The joint resolution would not compel the Secretary to impose that condition. It does not say he must impose that condition; it authorizes him to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it says that it "shall be operated as a common carrier." It is to be compulsory.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It ought to be. I am satisfied of that, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. KING. I am interested in the Government of the United States primarily in its efforts to sell the property, which the Government acquired at great expense during the war. I think the Government ought to obtain as much as it possibly can for the surplus which it has on hand, and the proposition to annex, as a condition to the sale, a provision which would practically result in the destruction of the value of the property, should challenge our attention very seriously.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is the language of the joint resolution:

> That the director of aircraft production, as the holder of stock belonging to the United States in the United States Spruce Production Corporation, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered—

He is not directed; he is—> hereby authorized and empowered to vote said stock in favor of selling the railroad, equipment, and material of said corporation prior to liquidation thereof, and as a condition of such sale he may require of the purchaser that the railroad so sold shall be operated as a common carrier.

And so forth.

It does not require him to impose that condition. So if he finds that in the interest of the Government it is wiser to sell it without that condition, he has the right to do it. The Secretary of War told me that he was satisfied that this railroad should be sold with that condition attached to the sale; but he has not the authority to do it. This merely empowers him to do it. If he finds that he can not make a profitable sale that way, or that it is not wise to sell it that way, then he can sell it outright. I think he should be given that power, in the interest of our people and in the interest of that section of the country, rather than have him restricted to a sale to private parties.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if the business handled by the road is sufficient to pay expenses, so as to justify its purchase and operation?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think so. It would be taken over as a matter of fact, if taken at all as a common carrier, by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad. I rather think that this road connects with the Milwaukee road. I am pretty sure that it does. That road could then make every local development. There would not be any profit, at least I do not think there would be, but I feel satisfied that it could be made a part of that system.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if it were not profitable, the Milwaukee road would not purchase it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the probability that it would become profitable was good, I think they would. I hope this power may be given to the Secretary, and that there will not be any objection to the passage of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Unless the objection is insisted upon, will the Senator from Iowa permit us to pass this joint resolution? I shall not ask it if it brings about any discussion.

Mr. CUMMINS. If it will not lead to any further discussion, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KING. Just one moment. If the Senator will accept this amendment, I shall not object. Add the following proviso:

> Provided, That the interests of the United States shall be primarily considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 9, after the word "authorize," insert a colon and the following proviso:

> Provided, That the interests of the United States shall be primarily considered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Director of Aircraft Production, as holder of stock in the United States Spruce Production Corporation, to vote to sell the assets of the corporation and to impose conditions on such sales."

POLITICAL PRISONERS.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia, assuming that the matter he brings up will require no debate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It will not. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table for appropriate reference two resolutions, S. Res. 162 and S. Res. 163, one of which the Secretary read during the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I beg leave to state just this much. It will not take two minutes. The resolutions do not seek to go into the Chicago cases or the San Francisco cases. They seek to go into cases where men and girls were tried under an act of Congress which has since been repealed. These persons have served three or four years in the penitentiary. Only one of them is from my State. He is an old Baptist preacher 75 years old. He was convicted for some words, for no act whatever against the Government, no act against the Army or the Navy. One of them is a girl from the West 17 years old. Another is an old man from the West 74 years old dying with consumption. Three or four of them are men who have had their sentences reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and still they languish in jail.

While I move to refer the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary, I do most respectfully and earnestly request that the committee take immediate action upon them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolutions will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair lays before the Senate House bill 8331, the unfinished business.

AMENDMENT OF TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1920.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8331) to amend the transportation act, 1920, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate Commerce with amendments.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, that it shall be read for amendments, and that the committee amendments shall be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a statement with reference to the request of the Senator from Iowa that the committee amendments be disposed of first.

I have always felt that that is an entirely proper request with reference to amendments to appropriation bills, but I have observed many cases where it brought about rather embarrassing results when applied to general legislative bills. I have noticed that we have been following that practice lately. So I am not going to object to the request of the Senator with reference to this bill, but I do feel disposed to give notice at this time that hereafter on purely legislative bills I shall object to the disposition of committee amendments first. I can see no reason why in legislative matters committee amendments should be given that preference. However, I shall not object in this case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. KENDRICK. I submit an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am going to make my statement of the purposes of the bill as brief as it is possible for me to make it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	McNary	Sheppard
Ball	Heflin	Moses	Smith
Broussard	Johnson	Myers	Smoot
Capper	Jones, Wash.	New	Spencer
Caraway	Kendrick	Newberry	Sutherland
Culberson	Kenyon	Nicholson	Townsend
Cummins	Keyes	Norris	Trammell
Curtis	King	Oddie	Underwood
Dial	Ladd	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
du Pont	La Follette	Page	Warren
Ernst	Lenroot	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Fernald	Lodge	Poindexter	Watson, Ind.
Fletcher	McCumber	Pomerene	Weller
Gooding	McKellar	Ransdell	Willis
Harris	McKinley	Reed

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are absent from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Fifty-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

[Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Senate. After having spoken for about an hour and thirty minutes he yielded the floor for the day.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

JUDGE WALTER I. SMITH.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before that is done, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly; I withhold the motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up a bill on the calendar. It is Order of Business 316, Senate bill 2649, to extend the benefits of section 260 of the Judicial Code to Judge Smith, one of the circuit judges of the eighth circuit.

The situation is this: Judge Smith was formerly a very distinguished Member of the House of Representatives. He was appointed circuit judge by President Taft. For five years he discharged his duties with great ability and great industry. Nearly five years ago he was stricken with paralysis. He struggled along for a year or two trying to do some work, but he was not very successful in it; and for more than two years he has not been able to sit upon the bench, and is a hopeless invalid. There is no hope whatever of his recovery, or that he ever will be able to perform any judicial work. He is a poor man, and of course he does not have to resign. He has not reached the age of 70 years; and this bill simply does for him what Congress did for Mr. Justice Moody a few years ago. It permits him to draw his salary for life if he will resign within two months, so that his place can be filled. It does not cost the Government anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 2649. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2649) to extend the benefits of section 260 of the Judicial Code to Walter I. Smith, United States circuit judge, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 260 of the Judicial Code, as amended by the act of February 25, 1919, chapter 29, section 6, be, and they are hereby, extended and made applicable to Walter I. Smith, United States circuit judge for the eighth circuit, notwithstanding that he has not attained the age of 70 years, as required by the aforesaid amended section: Provided, That the said Walter I. Smith shall resign the said office of United States circuit judge within two months after the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate, pursuant to the order heretofore made, adjourned until Friday, November 11, 1921, at 8 o'clock and 10 minutes a. m.

SUPPLEMENTARY CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

In executive session on yesterday, November 8, 1921, the following supplementary convention was ratified, and, on motion of Mr. LODGE this day, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the SENATE:

I transmit herewith, to receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, a supplementary convention between the United States and Great Britain, signed at Washington on October 21, 1921, providing for the accession of the Dominion of Canada to the convention concerning the tenure and disposition of real and personal property, concluded between the United States and Great Britain on March 2, 1899, a copy of which convention is, for the convenience of the Senate, attached to the accompanying report of the Secretary of State.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, October —, 1921.

Respectfully submitted.

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Know ye, that whereas a convention between the United States of America and Great Britain, relating to the tenure and disposition of real and personal property, was concluded at Washington on the 2d of March, 1899, the original of which convention, being in the English language, is, as amended by the Senate of the United States, word for word as follows:

The United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, desiring to improve the condition of the citizens and subjects of each of the respective countries in relation to the tenure and disposition of real and personal property situated or being within the territories of the other, as well as to authorize the representation of deceased persons by the consuls of their respective nations in the settlement of estates, have resolved to conclude a convention for those purposes and have named as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America; the Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the Right Hon. Who, having exchanged their said full powers, found in due and proper form, have agreed to and signed the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

ARTICLE II.

The citizens or subjects of each of the contracting parties shall have full power to dispose of their personal property within the territories of the other by testament, donation, or otherwise, and their heirs, legatees, and donees, being citizens or subjects of the other contracting party, whether resident or nonresident, shall succeed to their said personal property, and may take possession thereof either by themselves or by others acting for them, and dispose of the same at their pleasure, paying such duties only as the citizens or subjects of the country where the property lies shall be liable to pay in like cases.

ARTICLE III.

In case of the death of any citizen of the United States of America in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any subject of Her Britannic Majesty in the United States, without having in the country of his decease any known heirs or testamentary executors by him appointed, the competent local authorities shall at once inform the nearest consular officer of the nation to which the deceased person belonged of the circumstance, in order that the necessary information may be immediately forwarded to persons interested.

The said consular officer shall have the right to appear personally or by delegate in all proceedings on behalf of the absent heirs or creditors until they are otherwise represented.

ARTICLE VI.

The present convention shall come into effect 10 days after the day upon which the ratifications are exchanged and shall remain in force for 10 years after such exchange. In case neither of the high contracting parties shall have given notice to the other 12 months before the expiration of the said period of 10 years of the intention to terminate the present convention, it shall remain in force until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the high contracting parties shall have given such notice.

The United States or Her Britannic Majesty shall also have the right separately to terminate the present convention at any time on giving 12 months' notice to that effect in regard to any British colony, foreign possession, or dependency, as specified in Article IV, which may have acceded thereto.

ARTICLE VII.

The present convention shall be duly ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the approval of the Senate thereof, and by Her Britannic Majesty, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in London or in Washington.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 9, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, we trust that we do not come unto Thee boasting in our strength, but may we come humbled by our weakness. Our virtues are few and we are reproached by our sins. Have mercy upon us, O Lord, according to Thy loving kindness and our necessities. Stretch forth Thine hand toward us in the times of our need. Guide us when the paths are confused and we know not which one to take, and magnify in us Thy truth and wisdom. If the night comes down and shuts the way in darkness, O be the lamp of life unto our feet. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday 1 st was read and approved.

CAPT. NELSON M. HOLDERMAN.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the gallery one of my constituents, Capt. Nelson M. Holderman, a hero of the World War. Capt. Holderman was awarded the congressional medal of honor, the croix de guerre with palm, of France. The French cross of war was conferred upon him twice, and the Order of the Crown, of Belgium, and was cited for valorous and meritorious conduct.

Capt. Holderman entered the Army by way of the National Guard of California. He served overseas through the entire war. He was wounded seven times, and was in command of Company K, Three hundred and seventh Infantry, under Col. Whittlelesly, at the Battle of the Argonne. Col. Whittlelesly's regiment was known as the Lost Battalion. Eleven hundred men went into that action under Col. Whittlelesly. They were on the front of the firing line, were cut off from their command for five days and five nights, and were surrounded by the enemy, refused to surrender, and fought their way out. Of the eleven hundred men of that battalion who entered that battle but 165 returned alive or unwounded. All but 165 were either killed or wounded. In that battle Capt. Holderman was wounded three times, and while wounded led his men. [Applause.]

[Capt. Holderman stood up in the gallery amid the applause.]

Capt. Holderman is at present detailed to the command of an Infantry company at the Presidio of San Francisco, Calif. [Applause.]

I will read Capt. Holderman's citation:

General Orders, No. 11.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 12, 1921.

I. Award of medal of honor.—By direction of the President, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 9, 1918 (Bul. No. 43, W. D., 1918), the medal of honor was awarded by the War Department, in the name of Congress, to the following-named officer:

Nelson M. Holderman, captain, 307th Infantry, 77th Division. For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action against the enemy northeast of Binarville in the Forest of Argonne, France, October 2 to 8, 1918. Capt. Holderman commanded a company of a battalion which was cut off and surrounded by the enemy. He was wounded on October 4, on October 5, and again on October 7, but throughout the entire period, suffering great pain and subjected to fire of every character, he continued personally to lead and encourage the officers and men under his command with unflinching courage and with distinguished success. On October 6, in a wounded condition, he rushed through enemy machine-gun and shell fire and carried two wounded men to a place of safety.

By order of the Secretary of War:

PEYTON C. MARCH,
Major General, Chief of Staff.

OFFICIAL:
P. C. HARRIS,
The Adjutant General.

[Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit two unanimous-consent requests. First, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great convention of the American Legion was recently held at Kansas City, Mo. I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a general summary of the resolutions adopted. I will not take up the space in the RECORD to print the whole proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short summary of the resolutions adopted at the meeting of the American Legion in Kansas City. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, a great convention of the American Legion was held in Kansas City, Mo., October 31 and November 1 and 2, 1921. The resolutions adopted at that convention express the deliberate thought of nearly 1,000,000 ex-service men and women of the World War and should be communicated to the Congress. A summary of the proceedings is as follows:

SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS THIRD NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION.

INTRODUCTION.

"The physical manifestation of a great moral force."

Thus did Armando Diaz, general of the Italian Army, epitomize the third national convention of the American Legion. And no one of the thousands who crowded Kansas City for the great gathering of the men and women who wore the uniform of their country in the great World War failed to make his and her contribution to the carrying of that message to the entire world.

Never again in history will it be possible to duplicate the atmosphere of this convention. True, there may be even larger gatherings of the veterans and of those Americans subscribing to their ideals and purposes. But never again will it be possible to bring together for one event those leading figures in the titanic struggle from the chaos of which there emerged a chastened world ready for a message of peace, tolerance, and mutual helpfulness.

War-rended Europe sent the leaders of the allied military and naval forces to convey the greetings and felicitations of those slowly recovering countries. America contributed her share by a tremendous outpouring from peace time pursuits of that armed host that turned the tide of battle and made peace more speedily possible.

From Foch, the generalissimo of the allied armies; from Beatty, the British naval hero of the grand fleet; from Diaz, who headed the victorious Italian forces that routed the Austrians; from Jacques of the immortal Belgians; and from the chiefs of the veterans organizations kindred in spirit to the American Legion in Britain and continental Europe there came affectionate greetings to American comrades.

And there came, too, with a depth of earnestness from these distinguished visitors an appeal for a universal sympathy and brotherhood that would end for all time the conditions that made the new comradeship between the men of this country and other nations possible.

From Gen. John J. Pershing, Chief of Staff and General of the Armies of the United States, who was commander-in-chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in France; from Admiral Hugh Rodman, who headed the Nation's naval contribution to the grand fleet that checked the Hunnish submarine horrors; and from Maj. Gen. Commandant John Lejeune, of the United States Marine Corps, representing the final phase of the Nation's armed forces there came responses in behalf of those who had served and fought, which emphasized the strength of the ties that bind the veterans of the world together.

And from Calvin Coolidge, Vice President of the United States, as well as John G. Emery, the national commander of the American Legion, were evoked substantial statements which acknowledged and praised the deep interest of all Americans, including the veterans themselves, in the problems of the disabled and other comrades of the service and the Nation itself.

Thus it can hardly be taken as a surprise or a far-fetched tribute when the distinguished Italian warrior declared, after the steady ranks of marching American Legion members from every part of the Nation and the world had stepped by the reviewing stand for four hours, that the whole demonstration encompassed in the convention activities should be termed "the physical manifestation of a great moral force."

Kansas City lost its identity from Friday, October 28, to the same day a week later, because of the presence of the members of the American Legion and spacious though its great convention hall was, it did not begin to encompass the host that had descended upon the city.

Monday and Tuesday, October 31 and November 1, were the high-water marks of the convention. On the first day the American Legion's distinguished guests arrived, and with the exception of Marshal Foch and Gen. Pershing addressed the delegates. Tuesday was the marshal's own day, he gallantly sharing his honors with Gen. Pershing at the Convention Hall.

Tuesday afternoon an American demonstration of virility and patriotism and moral force was held that inspired and kept interested the distinguished visitors, as the marching hosts with flying colors and standards marched by in solid formation for nearly four hours. And surrounding the parade on every side for the 4 miles of the route were literally hundreds of thousands of persons jamming the streets solidly back to the house lines.

But the convention was not all a demonstration of the patriotic fervor of the legionnaires and their friends. Business sessions of the convention encompassed a widespread variety of business looking to the welfare of the disabled veterans of the war and the development of the permanent organization of the American Legion. New officers were selected, and with the inspiration of the historic meetings just closed the eyes of all legionnaires and the good citizenship of the world at large are turned upon America's premier organization of war veterans in watchful anticipation of the fulfillment of expectations.

In accordance with this decision the following departments are given one additional delegate:

The committee recommends to the national convention that letters containing checks and names of new members mailed in due time to reach the national treasurer 30 days prior to the date of the convention and postmark on the envelope or registry receipt clearly showing that it was mailed within that time, be deemed as having been received by the national treasurer within the meaning of the national constitution and that this ruling govern all future conventions.

REPORT OF NATIONAL COMMANDER.

National Commander Emery made his report to the convention.

"Commander EMERY: The report I am about to render to you on the occasion of the third convocation of the national representative assembly of the American Legion is, I am proud to state, one of brilliant achievement, which has placed the Legion in the forefront as a factor in the public life of our country. The honor of having led the Legion to these achievements is not mine. They were conceived and accomplished by that great leader and patriot, who has done more to advance the destinies of the legion than any other one man, our late and beloved commander, Frederick W. Galbraith, jr. [Applause.] Lord rest his soul. Let us stand for one moment in the hope that silence may convey what words can not, an expression of the debt this Legion and this Nation owes that great man."

The audience arose in silence.

"Strong nations and strong institutions profit by adversity which would crush and overcome individuals and institutions less strong. It has been so with the Legion. The tragic passing of Commander Galbraith was a crushing blow, but a blow from which the legion has recoiled with new determination. In the face of this and of adverse industrial conditions, which have hit the service man harder than they have any other class, the Legion has gained in strength and membership. Its financial condition has steadily improved.

"In the exposure and subsequent frustration of a nation-wide German propaganda campaign in the United States the Legion has within the past year rendered a great service.

"The greatest Legion achievement of the year has been won for our disabled comrades. Commander Galbraith studied all available data on the subject and found the situation disgraceful almost beyond belief. The Nation and the Legion itself were ignorant of the true conditions of mismanagement and neglect surrounding the administration of affairs of our disabled comrades.

"This state of affairs was reflected in the inactivity of the Congress and the incompetency of Government agencies. In the War Risk Insurance Bureau more than 100,000 claims were pending which were more than one year old. The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service was vainly pleading for money to equip 10,000 additional beds. Dissatisfaction with the work of the Federal Board for Vocational Training had reached a point where it was a subject of congressional investigation. Disabled veterans were in dire want. Thousands were without medical care or compensation with which to obtain it. Many had taken refuge in insane asylums, almshouses, and even jails.

"Galbraith's first stroke was to institute a vivid and forceful publicity campaign, bringing the true conditions before the Nation. The effect was almost instantaneous. In two months the case of the disabled had become a national issue.

"The beginning of the new year found the country and the Congress aroused and sympathetic. Instinctively they turned to the Legion for a remedy. Galbraith gathered a corps of the greatest experts in the country on all phases of veteran rehabilitation problems. Their recommendations were in definite form. Mr. Harding, who had meantime become President, was prevailed upon to assemble a committee headed by Charles G. Dawes to hear testimony and make recommendations.

"These recommendations of the Dawes committee coincided with the recommendations which had been worked out in the weeks preceding by Galbraith and his expert associates. They received the indorsement of the President and were transmitted to Congress for action.

"They began to drive for the necessary national legislation, a drive which culminated with the passage in August of the Sweet bill creating the Veterans' Bureau and displacing the incompetent old régime. It was a prodigious piece of legislative work.

"Our second great legislative fight has been for another class of disabled veterans, the financially disabled. Repeatedly during the disabled fight Galbraith served notice on official Washington that the Legion had not receded an inch on the question of adjusted compensation. As the fight for the disabled legislation progressed Galbraith and his associates were quietly working up the Legion's case for adjusted compensation.

"A year before the Legion's fourfold bill had passed the House by an overwhelming majority and died in the Senate committee. The House stood ready to act favorably on the measure again. The seat of confirmed opposition was in the Senate. The Legion received assurances that the bill would be reported out of committee in the Senate, which in the ordinary course of events would have meant its passage. The bill was reported out. The anticompensationists made their last desperate stand, and by a series of unprecedented measures succeeded in returning the McCumber bill to committee.

"First came the sensational letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to Senator FRELINGHUYSEN declaring that the payment of this just and legitimate debt to our country's defenders would bankrupt the Treasury.

"The cost of the bill was grossly exaggerated, and the hysterical cry of national bankruptcy was raised. Mr. Mellon's intemperate statements failed of their purpose. They did little to stem the tide in favor of passage of the McCumber bill.

"At this stage the President appeared. After a conference with a group of anticompensationist Senators at the Capitol, the Executive was told that if the passage of the McCumber bill was to be forestalled nothing but a dramatic personal appeal by the President could do it. Mr. Harding then decided on his extraordinary course, and addressed the Senate, with the result that the bill was reinterred in committee. In my opinion, when the Senate yielded to the President's dictation, it bowed to the will of the Executive and not to fact or reason.

"Such means as were used last summer to beat adjusted compensation can not ultimately succeed. Nothing is settled until it is settled right. And the national adjusted compensation issue has not been settled at all. The American people are the court of last resort, and whenever American people have by the ballot passed judgment on the matter of adjusted compensation that judgment has been an indorsement of the Legion's stand. I can not conceive a Congress so derelict in its duty, so unmindful of its just obligation to those who served their country at great financial loss, are so blind to the wishes of our people as to mislead again in refusing to adjust the economic balance between the man who went to war and the man who did not.

"In connection with our attitude toward Congress and others in legislative matters, your commander has felt that we should act as fearlessly toward them as did our brothers who lie in Flanders field when they dealt with our enemies. He has endeavored to speak and have the Legion speak to those who have not dealt with the service man as we felt they should be dealt with in no uncertain terms. In so doing he has not considered for one moment to what political party or faction they might belong.

"He also feels very strongly regarding the politic clause in our constitution and trusts that this convention will not allow it to be tampered with except possibly to strengthen it by adding appointive office as well as elective. I feel that no person in public office in community, State, or Nation should be allowed to speak officially for the Legion; that the Legion must continue to speak for itself, when issues involving service men are concerned, and then in terms which all the world will understand.

"Early in the administration of Col. Galbraith the American Legion became a member of the Inter-Allied Veterans' Association, a project very dear to the heart of our commander; with the idea of furthering a common understanding among the veterans of our allied nations the pilgrimage to France and Belgium was born. On our mission to Europe, your delegates were received with demonstrations of welcome and hospitality which France and Belgium never before have accorded to unofficial representatives of a foreign country.

"The pilgrimage to France marked the passage of the Legion's influence beyond the frontiers of the United States. It remains an American institution, but an American institution whose influence is being felt throughout the world.

"Your national executive committee early in the year passed a resolution to the effect that the service bureau should remain at national headquarters in Indianapolis. Following that, however, Commander Galbraith felt that they could perform their work better in Washington and removed the bureau to that place on his own initiative. After the Sweet bill was passed, decentralizing the efforts of the War Risk Bureau, your present commander felt that the Legion must decentralize its efforts with the Government, inasmuch as we had for two years, in season and out, demanded that the Government should handle the matter in this way. Therefore since September 30, as soon as convenient after the passage of the Sweet bill, the service work has been handled through 14 liaison officers, one in each of the 14 regional districts, with a contact office still maintained in Washington. The American Red Cross enabled us to put these men on by agreeing to pay their salaries as long as they shall be needed, and the first remittance of $35,000 has already been received for this purpose.

"The last national work undertaken by the Legion has been for the relief of our comrades who are unemployed. As a class service men are suffering more keenly than any other in the present period of industrial depression and subnormal employment. It is a duty of the Legion to extend every aid to these comrades, and a duty which I know the Legion will not fail to perform.

"To make and keep America truly American, to maintain in the hearts of our people allegiance to those basically American institutions and ideals of government which have made the name 'America' the hope of the world—this is the Legion's task that has fallen to our national Americanism commission. Its success has been as great as the success of the Legion, although many times the results of its efforts are not seen by the layman or casual observer.

"To-morrow morning there will be called to order in Kansas City another great convention, a convention which means the dawn of a new day in the making of a better America. The woman's auxiliary of the American Legion, with possibilities unbounded, is about to become an accomplished fact, independent and self-governing, a worthy compatriot of the Legion.

"The Legion has developed a highly specialized and effective means for carrying its message to the people. There is the American Legion Weekly, our national magazine. The American Legion News Service, our organization for the gathering, writing, and distribution of news of Legion activities, regularly is furnishing news of Legion activities to more than 10,000 newspapers which are read by 40,000,000 people. We are expanding the national speakers' bureau until within a few months we hope to have at hand a corps of 4,000 volunteer Legion orators throughout the country. We have in process of development a film service, the object of which is to enable posts to utilize motion pictures as a means of increasing interest and attendance in post meetings and spreading the general aims of the Legion through special films. These four agencies of publicity—the weekly, the news service, the speakers' bureau, and the film service—recently have been grouped under a director of publicity to insure synchronization and coordination of effort.

"Finances are on a sound basis. Current income is meeting current expenses and there is money in the treasury. The improvement mentioned is found also in State departments, and the State departments are but the reflections of the local posts.

"Your commander has two recommendations touching the matter of organization which he would like to place before you for your earnest consideration: First, I feel strongly that there should be at least three stated meetings of the national executive committee during the year, at quarterly intervals. Secondly, I feel that the time has arrived when we must give very earnest consideration to the matter of consolidating all bureaus and efforts of the Legion under one roof, or at least in one city. There is a great deal of lost motion and a reduction of efficiency under the present system, resulting in a very great lack of coordination in the efforts of the organization.

"Behind all this progress I have mentioned has been the toil of thousands of devoted and patriotic men and women to whom the Legion represents a splendid ideal, the ideal of service to our country and our comrades. I refer to all legionnaires throughout the length and breadth of the land. I have enjoyed their cooperation and support in all my work with the Legion as a post, a department, and a national officer. To them goes credit for what the Legion is—for they are the Legion. God bless the Legion!"

Mr. George L. Berry, who represented the American Federation of Labor and who is president of the International Printing Pressmens' Union, and a member of Hawkins County Post, No. 21, of Rogersville, Tenn., spoke.

ADDRESS OF MR. BERRY.

"Mr. BERRY. Mr. Commander and gentlemen of the convention, I have the honor and the privilege of bringing to this convention the felicitations of the American Federation of Labor, decided upon at the convention of that organization in the city of Denver last June. I assure you that the feeling of good wishes of the American Federation of Labor comes with a unanimous action of that convention. It was the result of the magnificent address delivered to that convention by the representative of the American Legion, Mr. Owsley, of the Americanism commission of this body.

"There is very little difference, fundamentally, in the purposes of these two great American organizations, and there is a basis upon which these two organizations, at least legislatively, can act in unison for the common good of the citizens of America. Fundamentally the American Federation of Labor and the American Legion stand for the conservation of the Constitution of the United States and the protection of the Republic that we love equally well.

"The American Federation of Labor and the American Legion stand opposed to the introduction in the affairs of our country of a system of government that has been found to be a failure, a system of government in contravention to every ideal of Americanism, and we are a unit not by word but by action in opposition to the introduction in the Republic of the United States of sovietism or bolshevism.

"Let me say to you, gentlemen of this convention, that there is no policy that appeals more strongly to the working men and women of America than that policy exemplified in the aggressive and progressive policy of Americanism as conducted by the American Legion.

"We feel, we know that we have in our organizations men and women who are no credit to either one of us, but it is impossible to expect the organization of men, human beings, to be free from the sordid men who are out to disrupt and break down the organizations as represented, like the Legion and the Federation. But there are a sufficient number of constructive, patriotic men in both organizations to overcome the obstacles and meddling outsiders, their action to the contrary notwithstanding. And when I say to you that the convention of the American Federation of Labor has sent to this convention a representative by unanimous indorsement of the convention in Denver you can better realize the genuineness and sincerity of the men and women who toil in this country as regards their feeling toward the American Legion.

"I am happy in the fact that this splendid contact has been made between these two great organizations, because, gentlemen, this convention proves the growth of the membership of the Legion and indicates that we have not been led nor do we believe that our duties ended on the 11th day of November.

"There has never come to organizations such response for statesmanship, both political and industrial, as is upon the shoulders of the members of the American Legion. The federation, legislative and nonpartisan as it is, stands ready to support the American Legion in its legislative aspirations that we believe are right, the politicians to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Of course, it is to be expected that the Federation will attract greater criticism than will the American Legion, because the Federation, in addition to being a legislative organization, is made up of international unions that are economic fundamentally and in many instances exclusively, and when the question of wages and our open-shop conditions are to be considered there is usually some degree of controversy; but this, gentlemen, should be known with respect to the position of the American Federation of Labor, that we stand for collective bargaining arrived at by conciliation, and if that fails, by arbitration; we are prepared, as the labor movement of America, to accept the facts evolving out of the differences that arise between the employer organizations and the employee organizations of this country. What more could be expected?

"We have said, and I believe properly so, that the cost of living should not be the determining factor in the adjustment of wages. We believe that the industrial conditions, the physical relationship of industry, should determine wages and not the fluctuation in the price of a potato. We believe it unfair that wages should be determined by the rise or the fall of the cost of living, but in this we stand for the arbitration of those issues by the facts involved in the controversy and in the industry affected. What more can be expected? But unfortunately there has grown up in America, and to some extent in all of the other countries of the world, a custom that we were pleased to call during the Great War 'direct action.'

"It is true that there were organizations of labor, outlaw in the majority of instances, that took direct action to force conditions not justified by the facts involved in the controversy that we style direct action. We are opposed to direct action.

"We stand for the determination of the affairs between men of labor and men of the employers' organizations by the arbitration and the determination of those issues by fact. I am opposed to the use of circumstantial advantage, whether it comes from the employer organization or whether it comes from the employee organization, to force home by a condition of plenty or by a condition of poverty a condition—working condition or industrial condition—that is not founded upon the truth.

"We stand for the continuation of industry uninterrupted, and propose to exercise the instrument of strike as the very last resort, and to you gentlemen, to the fair-minded citizenship of America, there rests upon your shoulders the fight to establish the truth, to maintain justice, to be sure that when you attack some one for an industrial controversy you attack the right party. It is not always the man that cries 'thief' the loudest that is the most innocent man in the congregation.

"I make this observation without fear of contradiction, that the majority of industrial conflicts result from the refusal of one side or the other to abide by facts. The trade-union movement of this country can not escape the obligation that they owe the industry. They can't expect to receive from it more than they assist in putting into it. And if it is not there to be had, then it is their duty to meet that condition in a statesmanlike manner, and it is the duty of the employer organizations to make known the facts to their fellows in industrial pursuits. That is the thing; that is the situation; that is the work that is upon the shoulders of every American citizen who believes genuinely in America. My friends, disabuse your minds of the fact of the statements that have gone abroad that the trade-union movement has closed its eyes to readjustment. The man who closes his eyes to industrial readjustment, whether it is the employer or the employee organization, is a fool and not deserving of the sympathetic consideration of the fair citizenship in our country.

"We must ever stand for readjustment, because readjustment in the main means progress, and the Legion can be satisfied readjustment means the conservation of industry in America, and it is the duty of every man, employer or employee, to join in a constructive readjustment of the industry of this country to the end that justice might apply, to the end that our industrial organization may continue uninterrupted, to the end that there may come to this country a stability, industrial stability, that means the very foundation of our Republic.

"Gentlemen, I am happy to be here as the representative of the American Federation of Labor, to briefly say to you what hundreds of laboring men on this continent are saying every day—what has been said on the floor of the convention of the American Federation of Labor, I am, in addition to that, proud to be here as a delegate from the department of Tennessee and to be able to greet you, not only in the name of the American Federation of Labor but in the name also of the great State of Tennessee. I thank you for the consideration given me."

A vote of thanks to the American Federation of Labor was passed unanimously.

The Hon. Calvin Coolidge, Vice President of the United States, was introduced by Commander Emery and addressed the convention.

The national commander introduced Mr. A. A. Pearson, who spoke in behalf of the commander of the Confederate Veterans of America.

The memorial service for the late Commander Galbraith was held.

Chaplain John F. Horget read the prayer.

Mr. Milton J. Foreman, of Illinois, read the eulogy.

Mrs. John G. Emery sang.

The convention adjourned at 12.10 p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The meeting convened at 2.15 o'clock, Vice Commander Bannigan presiding. Commander Emery presented to the convention Gen. Armando V. Diaz, of Italy, and Lieut. Gen. Baron Jacques, of Belgium. They addressed the convention and were decorated with the Legion emblem. Maj. Gen. John A. Lejeune, commandant of the Marine Corps, spoke.

Mr. Gilbert Bettman, chairman of the national legislative committee, presented a synopsized report.

REPORT OF CHAIRMAN OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE.

"Mr. GILBERT BETTMAN: If the American Legion legislative activities had accomplished during the year nothing more than the passage of the Sweet bill, which consolidated the Government bureaus and decentralized their operations in the field, I think the American Legion could feel that its legislative activities were justified. For that result, although accomplished in the name of the legislative committee, chief credit is due to the dynamic energy and the engaging personality of our dear past commander, F. W. Galbraith.

"There are many other points that we might tell you of in connection with our legislative activity, but beyond the Sweet bill, in view of the numbers here and some of our guests who want to withdraw, I shall limit myself to reporting to this convention on another subject that was also close to the heart of our past commander—the subject of adjusted compensation.

"The attitude of the legislative committee, and they hope that they have reflected the attitude of the Legion, has been that our first concern is with the disabled, and it was not until the program for the benefit of the disabled was well under way that the American Legion proceeded to lay emphasis on the adjusted compensation measures. The adjusted compensation measure, as you know, was passed by an overwhelming vote in the House before our last convention at Cleveland. Pressure was then brought to bear by the legislative committee in the Senate. The Senate referred it to the Senate Finance Committee. A hearing was had by that committee, at which our Commander Galbraith appeared, and the chairman of the legislative committee, and our arguments were received.

"Again we had a hearing before the Senate Finance Commmittee, and the Senate Finance Committee by an overwhelming vote reported the bill favorably. The bill was then called up for passage, made the unfinished business, which meant that it would be called up in the Senate. It was made the unfinished business by a vote of 46 to 4.

"Along toward the middle of July, or the 10th of July, it became obvious that the Senate of the United States was going to follow the lead of the House and pass the adjusted compensation measure. At that time it was said that the administration was considering asking a postponement of the passing of that bill. We understand that the President was assured that only his personal appeal to the Senate of the United States could stop the passage of the adjusted compensation bill. And you all know that on July the 12th that appeal was made and the bill was recommitted. After that recommittal your legislative committee then attempted to ascertain what was the proposal of the Government in regard to this legislation, and we visited the President and some of the members of his Cabinet. We brought to them the message that the adjusted compensation measure could not be downed.

"The President responded that the adjusted-compensation measure was not tabled but postponed. He told the representatives of the Legion that he had been elected upon a platform to reduce taxation, and that if the adjusted compensation bill passed at that time it would be impossible to carry out that pledge. We asked when we could hope for the passage of the adjusted compensation measure and we were told that as soon as the Government's bill to provide for the funding of the foreign debt was under way, then the adjusted-compensation measure could be and would be taken up.

"We also saw some of the members of the President's Cabinet, and we assured those members that the Legion was unanimous on the question of adjusted compensation.

"We also saw the Members of the Senate who had this legislation in charge and were assured by Senator MCCUMBER, who had control of the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee, that in December of this year the adjusted-compensation measure would be passed.

"The message which we brought to the President and to his advisors was this: That the Legion was unanimous and the service men were unanimous upon this subject. Further, that there were countless thousands of men in the service in the Army who believed that the men were entitled to adjusted compensation, not as a bonus for military service rendered, not as a gratuity for heroic work well done, but as approximate adjustment of the economic disadvantage which the men suffered by reason of their days in service.

"We told the President and his advisors that in addition to those thousands of men that held that view, there were other thousands who held the view that they were entitled to it on sentimental grounds or because of their military service performed, and that the combination of those who felt they were entitled to it upon economic grounds with those that thought they were entitled to it on sentimental or military grounds made a phalanx that could not be defeated.

"In answer the administration gave us the promises which I have detailed to you. That gives you the present situation on the adjusted-compensation measure. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if I could add one word, because I may not be here at the time we finally consider our attitude upon this measure. Let me say a personal word.

"Together with Commander Emery and Vice Commander Scrugham I was on the original soldier beneficial legislation committee that wrote the adjusted-compensation measure. I have appeared at all the hearings to fight for this measure because in my heart I believe it is just and I expect and hope to fight for it until it is finally passed. I say that word because I want you men to know that in what I am about to say I am speaking as a legionnaire, and nothing else. [Applause.]

"What the American Legion should do now appears to me in the light of the history of this legislation to be this: We must give honest and deliberate consideration to the arguments that have been made by any member of the administration and to every line and syllable of the President's address to the Senate. After that deliberate consideration to all those arguments, let us again reaffirm the justice of the claim of the soldier for adjusted compensation.

"But let us not, my comrades, go further. I have heard it stated that something further might be attempted, something in the nature of a personality or a censure. Let us place our case on the justice of our cause and on nothing else. [Applause.]

"The strength of the American Legion is in its catholicity, is the fact that you can't dismiss what it does on the ground that it is politic or on the ground that it represents capital or labor or any religion.

"We are a cross-cut across the entire Nation. Let us therefore do nothing with regard to this cause which is close to our hearts which may have the slightest politic complexion. [Applause.] In saying that, I hope you men of the Legion will believe that I, who have been in this from the beginning and hope to stay to the end, have spoken not as a Republican, not even as a citizen, but as a member of the American Legion."

Gen. McBride, representing the G. A. R.: Col. Neol George Crossfield, vice chairman of the British Legion; and Mrs. Nell Berger, of the Missouri W. C. T. U., addressed the convention.

EVENING SESSION.

The meeting convened at 8.40 o'clock, Vice Commander Pendill presiding. Commander Emery introduced Admiral David Beatty, of Great Britain, who addressed the convention. Admiral Beatty was made a member of the American Legion. Admiral Hugh Rodman, of the American Navy, spoke.

The report of the committee on time and place of the next convention was adopted by vote of the convention, as follows:

1. That New Orleans be the convention city in 1922 for the fourth annual national convention of the American Legion.

2. That the national executive committee be designated to set definite dates for the said convention after arranged conferences with the proper committee of the convention city.

It is further recommended that the executive committee consider in their deliberations the selection of the third.

3. The committee recommends that the invitation of the city of Philadelphia to hold the convention in that city in 1926, during the sesquicentennial international exposition, receive the favorable consideration of the convention.

4. Your chairman respectfully presents in conjunction with this report the following suggestion by our national adjutant:

"The experience of this year and of the two preceding conventions confirms one on the feeling that for future conventions of the American Legion, more than three days should be made available. The suggestion is therefore most respectfully made that in deciding upon the time for the next meeting that five days be decided upon and that at least one day be given over to regimental and divisional reunions, one day to parade and general public activities, and the balance of the time to business sessions proper."

TUESDAY, November 1, 1921.

MORNING SESSION.

The meeting convened at 9 a. m., Commander John G. Emery presiding.

Marshal Foch and Gen. Pershing entered. They were greeted with a great ovation. The Marseillaise and the Star Spangled Banner were sung.

Commander Emery introduced Gen. Pershing, who addressed the convention, then presented Marshal Foch. Marshal Foch spoke in French, and Francis Drake, of Paris Post, read the translation. The convention cheered uproariously for Foch and France. Texas presented flowers to the marshal and Montana a wildcat kitten. Foch was made a member of the American Legion.

The convention voted to recess at 11 a. m. to attend the dedication of the Kansas City Memorial Hall.

The meeting adjourned at 10.35 a. m. until 8.30 Wednesday morning.

Adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, November 2, 1921.

MORNING AND AFTERNOON SESSION.

The meeting convened at 9.10 a. m., Commander John G. Emery presiding. Father O'Conner, of Ohio, pronounced the invocation. The ceremonies covering opening and closing of meetings, initiations, installation of officers, dedicating colors, halls, and memorials, funeral service, Memorial Day—in public hall or grove, Memorial Day—at cemetery, Independence Day, and armistice day were presented by the ceremonials committee. The report of the committee was adopted. The American daisy was adopted as the official Legion flower, instead of the poppy.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS.

The report of the committee on constitutional amendments was presented, as follows:

"The constitution of any organization in which the majority rules is the only safeguard of the minority and should not be amended in any particular except in situations of grave emergency.

"Your committee has carefully examined and investigated all proposed amendments which were submitted to it and find no need at the present for any of the proposed amendments. We do, therefore, recommend that the national constitution be not amended in any particular at this time. This committee believes that the present constitution is a complete document and sufficiently adequate for the government of the American Legion.

"This committee calls the attention of the convention to the fact that the constitution provides that all proposed amendments shall be read to the convention at least 24 hours prior to the time at which a vote is to be taken. By adjourning on the morning of November 1 without the opportunity being given to read any proposed amendments, the adjournment being until the morning of November 2, the constitution could not be amended even though a necessary amendment had been proposed.

"We direct the attention of the convention to this fact in order that future conventions may not fall into this error."

This report was adopted.

20. A resolution urging the repeal of the act of October 6, 1917, which interferes with the promotion of ex-service men of the Government employ.
21. A resolution to secure the recognition of Armistice Day, November 11, as a national holiday.
22. A resolution to exempt disabled veterans from payment of taxes upon compensation and insurance.
23. A resolution urging the enactment into law of the provisions contained in war risk regulation No. 57.

24. A resolution urging certain amendments to the war risk insurance act.
25. A resolution to provide burial expense not to exceed $200 for ex-service persons who die outside of the service or in hospital receiving treatment as a Veterans' Bureau patient.
26. A resolution urging the reclamation of lands which may be settled upon by ex-service men.
27. A resolution providing for retirement for disabled emergency Army officers the same as is granted to officers of the Regular Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.
28. A resolution approving the work of the national legislative committee and recommending that this committee continue its efforts to secure favorable action upon certain bills still pending in the Senate and in the House which were recommended at the previous convention.
29. A resolution demanding the immediate passage by Congress of the American Legion fivefold adjusted compensation measure.

J. G. Scugham, of Nevada, read the report on adjusted compensation, as follows:

"Whereas there is pending in Congress H. R. No. 1 and S. 506, a measure to provide adjusted compensation to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War; and
"Whereas this adjusted compensation measure provides for the payment of the Nation's just obligations to the service men and women for the financial and economical handicap suffered by them incident to their service; and
"Whereas the Nation should and is paying all of its other war debts and obligations; and
"Whereas the obligation of the Nation to its soldiers arises by reason of economic handicap suffered by them because of their service, which economic handicap is at this time felt with especial severity because of widespread general unemployment; and
"Whereas after careful consideration of all the arguments advanced in opposition to the measure, including the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the address of the President to Congress, we still firmly believe in the justice, fairness, and immediate necessity of the adjusted compensation measure: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the American Legion, in national convention assembled, reaffirms its stand upon adjusted compensation and asks that the Congress of the United States pass this measure without further equivocation or delay."

The legislative report was adopted.

REPORT OF AMERICANISM COMMITTEE.

The report of the Americanism committee was presented by Charles H. Kendrick, of California. The report of the permanent national Americanism commission was approved. Recommendations were:

1. That the national finance committee appropriate to the national Americanism commission a sum not to exceed the amount recommended by the national executive committee.
2. That the remainder of the report of the national Americanism commission, together with the national director's report and the papers attached thereto, be referred to the national executive committee.

The resolutions recommended for adoption by the convention were:

EDUCATION.

Be it resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That—

1. Education in citizenship is the keynote of Americanism. The education must reach the adult as well as the child, native born and foreigner alike. A knowledge of the English language is essential to good citizenship. The draft statistics of the late war showed that 24.9 per cent of the men examined for the draft could not read English. This indicates a deplorable and dangerous menace to the Nation's welfare. Although the various States have compulsory attendance laws, it is a matter of official record that of the 27,000,000 children of school age in the United States but 15,000,000 are in daily attendance, and as a consequence the United States ranks only ninth among the civilized nations of the world in educational matters. At the present time 25 States have laws requiring that English be the medium of instruction in all elementary and high schools. Many of these laws were enacted by request of the Americanism commission, and similar bills have been introduced in two States. In all States which do not have such laws everything possible should be done to secure similar legislation, and we desire to impress most strongly upon the various posts and departmental organizations of the Legion, and in particular upon the chairman of Americanism in the various State departments, that they do everything in their power not only to secure the enactment of laws to control this situation, but to see that such laws when enacted be strictly carried out.
2. United States history and civil government are often taught only in a cursory manner in the public schools. Educational authorities should encourage such a full, intimate study of these subjects as will develop in the child adequate respect and love for his country. A definite period should be devoted every week in public and private schools to appropriate patriotic exercises.
3. We believe that motion pictures and stereopticons can be used advantageously in patriotic education, and we approve the action of national headquarters in developing this service and urge its continuation and extension.
4. We recommend the indorsement of the program of cooperation between the Legion and the National Educational Association adopted at Des Moines July 4, 1921, and the plan for the holding of American education week December 4 to 10.
5. In education for citizenship, thorough training in the fundamentals should be emphasized. Ideals of service and cooperation for the common good should be developed, particularly in the children, in order to fit them for the responsibilities of modern industrial and political life. Civil playgrounds under proper directors are an exceedingly effective means of developing these ideals and educating children for citizenship, particularly among the foreign-born children. We strongly indorse such playground training and urge its extension.
6. Referring to House of Representatives bill No. 72, submitted April 26, 1921, with reference to the use of the English language in schools, it is the opinion of the Legion that for the words "controlling medium of instruction" there should be substituted "only medium of instruction."
7. It is a well-known fact that the national flag is often thoughtlessly treated with disrespect. It should never be used for advertising purposes. The American Legion urges that steps be taken to bring about a condition of affairs in all communities that will insure for the flag due respect and consideration. The American Legion also suggests that in the 12 States where a law does not exist requiring the flag to be displayed daily during school hours over public-school buildings, the Legion of those States do its utmost to have such laws enacted.
8. We believe there should be inculcated in the minds of the people the ideal that there can be no true Americanism without an honest and intelligent ballot honestly counted. We must have adequate election laws, and these laws must be strictly enforced. The American Legion should lead in the fight against those enemies of republican government who corrupt the election machinery for selfish ends.

(9) Whereas there are in this country many foreign-born residents who are not being assimilated, due largely to the fact that the opportunity has not been afforded them to acquaint themselves with the American language, customs, and laws; and
Whereas this ignorance on their part has a tendency to promote radicalism in our midst, which we deem it our duty to avoid, and we further deem it our duty to assist them in acquiring at least some knowledge of our language and institutions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion in convention assembled urge each post to take steps immediately to establish and put into operation an adequate Americanization program, following the policy outlined by national headquarters; be it further

Resolved, That the national legislative committee of the American Legion be instructed to draft suitable and proper legislation to be presented to the National Congress of the United States for the institution and maintenance of instruction in the English language, civil government, and American history, and the establishing of contact with those eligible for such instruction; and be it further

Resolved, That the Americanism commission of the American Legion appear before Congress in all matters affecting Americanism.

(10) Be it resolved, That the American Legion favors the adoption of State laws requiring every teacher in every elementary and high school and every instructor or professor in every higher institution of learning, excepting those who are citizens of another country and only temporarily teaching in this country, to subscribe to an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States and of the State where employed, and that we also favor a law permitting the cancellation of the certificate of any teacher found guilty of disloyalty to the Government.

IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION.

Be it resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled:

1. That we favor an examination of all immigrants at the point of embarkation or the nearest United States consulate before embarkation, this examination to include not only physical and blood tests but also an examination into the general desirability of the immigrant with respect to his future as an American citizen, including a test of his or her degree of mentality. Also that the Bureau of Citizenship under the Department of Labor be required to have all aliens register for the purpose of education for citizenship.
2. That we favor a system of registration of all immigrants at the point of debarkation and the enforcement of diligent effort on the part of immigrants to obtain first and final naturalization papers within the respective periods of time permitted by law or such reasonable extension thereof as may be granted for due cause, and urges deportation to the country of their origin on failure diligently to prosecute their rights to naturalization.
3. That we favor as a prerequisite to naturalization reasonable proficiency in the reading and writing of English and knowledge of civics and American history, all evidenced by a certificate granted after an examination conducted by lawfully constituted authorities of public instruction, the present system of granting application for naturalization being too often mere form, leaving untested the alien's capacity for citizenship.
4. That we favor uniform and dignified naturalization ceremonies designed to impress on new citizens the dignity, responsibilities, and privileges of American citizenship in all courts with naturalization jurisdiction. Such ceremonies should be held periodically, so that new citizens can be received in groups.
5. That we favor encouragement by the American Legion of all social organizations looking toward the welfare of the alien, and the Legion's cooperation with all schools engaged in the education of the alien.
6. That we favor encouragement by the Legion of all worthy organizations striving to eliminate the "padrone" system and to make the alien independent of loan sharks, usurers, and all individuals whose methods of business result in the practical enslavement of the alien for years, thereby retarding and often preventing his attainment of citizenship.
7. That we declare ourselves in favor of the exclusion of all aliens for a period of five years: Provided, however, That the father, mother, sister, wife, or husband of an American citizen be allowed admission.
8. That we reaffirm the position taken at our two previous conventions with respect to Japanese immigration.

HAWAII.

That we urge Congress to adopt a Hawaiian policy which shall result in a larger population of distinctly American origin and a diversification of alien population, with a view to military, social, and economic safety.

ANTIAMERICAN PROPAGANDA AND RADICALISM.

There are numbers of people and agencies engaged in an attempt to change our form of government, industrial and social life. The motives of some of these people are sincere, of others insincere.

Their methods are twofold. First, through free speech and a free press, leading to changes by the ballot and evolution. Second, through prostitution of free speech and a free press, inciting the people to class consciousness and strife and leading to changes by revolution. The persons and agencies using the latter method are termed "radicals."

Be it resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That we hold the first method of changing our institutions to be in keeping with the American spirit and Constitution. The second we condemn as unlawful and un-American.

2. That the program of education outlined by the National Americanism Commission be carried out.
3. That the schools should be removed from the influence of partisan politics, and that the qualification of instructions be only their capability and their Americanism.

4. That the passage by States of laws to make the teaching of disloyalty in any school an offense punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, is urged.

5. That the Legion render all possible assistance to the school authorities by reporting to them all instances of disloyalty.

6. That we favor universal compulsory education.

7. That the American Legion take means to inform foreigners grouped in colonies within the United States, in the language of the foreigner, if necessary, of the system of government of the United States and the opportunity offered under such government.

8. That the Legion discourage the distribution, the purchase, and sale of all radical literature.

9. That all legion posts keep a watchful eye on radical propagandists and use all lawful means to prevent the fulfillment of their plans; that owners of halls and auditoriums in which radical meetings might be held be urged not to lease their property to such persons for such purposes; that newspapers be requested not to publish advertisements announcing radical meetings; and that officials of legion posts be urged to notify peace officers of all such contemplated gatherings coming under their observation, that such meetings may be prevented or dispersed if they transgress upon our laws.

10. That the national legislative committee give consideration to some measure which will provide severe penalties for inciting the overthrow of the Government by means of violence.

V. PUBLICITY.

Be it resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That the plan of furthering the Americanism work of the American Legion through publicity is referred to the National Americanism Commission and to the national executive committee in so far as the jurisdiction of each may apply. The suggested outline of publicity contained in the report of the National Americanism Commission is specifically recommended for their action.

VI. DRAFT EVADERS AND POLITICAL PRISONERS.

(1) Whereas during the period of the war there were convicted and confined in various penal institutions a number of men charged and convicted of treasonable acts, utterances, and conduct against the Government of the United States; and

Whereas in numerous incidents influences have been brought to bear to secure the pardon of the criminals or to secure a general amnesty for all such so-called political convicts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we oppose the pardon of Eugene V. Debs and any person convicted of any treasonable conduct against the United States Government, or the granting of a general amnesty to such convicts; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be spread upon the records of this convention and a copy thereof be sent to the President of the United States.

(2) Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That drastic measures in the prosecution of service evaders and deserters by the Federal authorities is urged.

(3) Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we indorse the action of the national legislative committee regarding the release of political prisoners confined under the espionage act.

(4) Whereas one Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, a prisoner escaped from the military authorities of the United States Government; and

Whereas the Alien Property Custodian of the United States Government, acting under and by authority of his office, has seized all property belonging to the said Grover Cleveland Bergdoll: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we indorse the action of the Alien Property Custodian in seizing the property and assets of the said Grover Cleveland Bergdoll; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and the Alien Property Custodian.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR NATIONAL AMERICANISM COMMISSION.

Be it resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That the reception of funds contributed for the legion program of Americanism from any source if given without restrictions be authorized: Provided, That the acceptance or rejection of such contributions is placed in the joint authority of the national commander, the national finance committee, and the national director of the Americanism commission: Provided further, That the names of all donors and the amounts subscribed be published in the columns of the American Legion Weekly.

PATRIOTIC OBSERVANCES.

Whereas members of the American Legion in Europe have witnessed with indignation the use of our national flag for the purposes of advertisement, and even less worthy ends;

Whereas the department of France of the American Legion has secured, continuously, action against such abuses when they have been discovered in France; and

Whereas the French authorities have lent their whole-hearted cooperation for the stopping of said abuses whenever specific instances have been brought to their attention; and

Whereas in other European countries it has not always been possible to obtain the assistance of the national authorities in suppressing the misuses of the American Flag: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion in national convention assembled urges upon the Congress of the United States the paramount necessity of passing suitable legislation making within the limits and territorial possessions of the United States the misuse of the flag of any country on friendly terms with the Government and people of the United States an offense of the most serious nature, involving punishment by Federal authorities of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That when said legislation has been passed and put into effect by the Congress of the United States there then be negotiated treaties of reciprocity with friendly countries for the protection of the American Flag within their boundaries and possessions.

(2) Be it resolved by the American Legion in national convention assembled, That the legion should always be ready to cooperate with other organizations in the observance of patriotic holidays or occasions, and that steps should be taken in conference with such organizations, both nationally and locally, to increase such cooperation, to decrease the duplication of effort and expense, and to increase through such cooperation public reverence for the flag and other patriotic symbols; but we reaffirm the idea that on Armistice Day the American Legion should be accorded the position of leadership in the observance.

All of the resolutions contained in the above report of the Americanism committee were adopted.

The resolution opposing the pardon of Debs was passed with cheers and a rising vote.

A resolution making the legion call upon the Federal Government to use every legal means at its disposal to have Grover Cleveland Bergdoll brought back from Germany was adopted.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON ORGANIZATION.

That it is to the best interests of the American Legion as a whole and its outposts upon the Continent of Europe that under existing conditions for some years to come these posts be assembled under the direction of the present department of France, under the title of "Department of Continental Europe," that said posts be so notified and said department so chartered.

That the American Legion recognizes La Societe des Mommes 40 et Chevaux 8 as the official fun making organization appurtenant to the American Legion.

REPORT OF RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE.

Resolutions adopted by the convention follows:

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God to remove from the head of the American Legion our peerless leader, Frederick W. Galbraith, jr.; and

Whereas this misfortune has occurred since the last convention of the American Legion; and

Whereas this convention does so feel the loss of our late commander and realizes that this loss is the occasion of much grief to others as well as to the American Legion.

That the American Legion, in convention assembled, express to the Nation its deep grief at the untimely death of our late commander, held by us to be the ideal type of American in all the sense that that great term does imply and that a copy of this resolution, suitably engrossed, be presented to the family of our late commander.

That the third annual convention of the American Legion records its sincere and deep appreciation of the magnificent reception and arrangements provided by the people of Kansas City through their city officials, their patriotic, civic, and the many other organizations which have made possible the splendid success of this convention.

That the American Legion, in convention assembled, do enter a solemn protest against the mitigation of the sentence of Eugene V.

Debs, or of any and all sentences imposed on obstructionists to the conscription laws, on conscientious objectors, and on violators of the laws of the United States to protect its peace and security in time of peril or to assist in the national defense, and we call attention to the impropriety of taking any such action while ex-service men are being held for trival violations of the Articles of War.

That the American Legion indorse the idea of an international armament limitation agreement.

That this convention go on record as favoring the memorialization of public highways, streets, and parks, particularly by tree planting and erection of tablets.

That the American Legion commends the publication of slacker lists when correct, and requests that such publication be continued and that such lists be given the widest publicity possible by the press.

That the American Legion favors the observance of May 30 in a spirit of reverence for the departed instead of one of celebration.

That we recommend the adoption by the national convention of a program to the end that special field workers, except those necessary to promote welfare work among disabled veterans, be discontinued, and that the national executive committee be requested to take a more active part in directing the activities of the national department, and that said committee be requested to formulate a general program and leave it to the States to put such program into effect.

That all budget recommendations included in any convention reports be considered as recommendations to the national executive committee of maximum limits and not mandates to the national committee that the sums stated in said budget must be allowed by the national committee, but that the national committee may reduce expenditures as it sees fit regardless of convention committee reports favorably adopted.

That a request be made of the President of the United States to continue all ex-service men in public office which they may now be holding, regardless of their political affiliations, provided their service has been satisfactory.

That the American Legion extend to all railways having granted reduced rates to the American Legion their thanks and appreciation for their patriotic assistance.

Whereas the prevalence of tuberculosis among ex-service men has created a problem of most serious proportions, both to the Government and to the American Legion; and

Whereas the National Tuberculosis Association has been generous in its continuous cooperation with the American Legion and the Federal agencies that have been trying to solve this problem and to provide proper care for tuberculous ex-service men; and

Whereas the State and local tuberculosis associations have constantly supported the efforts of the American Legion in securing adequate care for ex-service men and are still continuing with their educational and organization campaigns to reduce the incidence of tuberculosis among ex-soldiers.

That the American Legion pledges its unqualified support to the National Tuberculosis Association and its affiliated State and local associations in the fight against tuberculosis which they are carrying on, and that we urge all local posts of the American Legion to cooperate with local and State tuberculosis associations in their several campaigns for the prevention of tuberculosis and especially in the fourteenth annual Christmas seal sale.

That the American Legion vote its thanks to the American Red Cross for this generous aid and its appreciation of the high ideals that justified the gift.

That a demand is made for the execise of every available method to secure the return of Grover C. Bergdoll to the United States for the completion of his sentence as a deserter and for his trial for any other offense committed by him against the laws of the United States, and that a demand is made for the prompt trial of every person who may be implicated in his escape from the United States.

That the American Legion recommends that the enemy property held by the United States be used to settle the claims of Americans against Germany, or held as an offset until these claims are paid in full.

That the American Legion reiterates its position in favor of the adjusted compensation for discharged soldiers and deplores the request of President Harding to delay passage by Congress of a measure providing for same and the acquiescence of Congress in that request.

That the sentiments expressed by America's ambassador, Col. George Harvey, in his Pilgrim Day speech, setting forth the reasons for America's entry into the World War and the cause for which America fought, does not represent the true American attitude as interpreted by the American Legion, and let it be known now and for all time that America fought not only for the maintenance of America's rights, but for the freedom of the world, and that a copy be forwarded to the President of the United States.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

While heartily in favor of the International Conference for the Limitation of Armaments soon to be held in Washington, D. C., your committee believes that the American Legion demands an adequate Navy for the maintenance of our country as a world power and the protection of those policies which are distinctly American.

In order to build such a Navy it is essential that it be regarded as a strictly national instrument. The safety of our whole country depends first of all upon the Navy. Every step, therefore, should be taken only on the basis of accomplishing the greatest good for the entire country. Purely sectional advantages and political considerations must be set absolutely aside and every American think in terms of the whole America.

If the American people are led to believe that its first line of defense is ready and adequate, when, as a matter of fact, it is not, such propaganda is not only useless, but gives a sense of false security and is fatal in time of stress.

We believe that a surface fleet will always be a requisite for safety and that great speed for such vessels is a necessity.

We learned nothing in the last war to indicate that any other branch of naval welfare can press home a victory on a nation which is in any way self-sustaining

We believe that great attention must be given to the development of the underwater arm of our national defense.

The fact is that at this late date, with the advantages we have had from war-time observation, foreign sources of information, and captured U-boats, we find ourselves without any really efficient submarines.

At the present time we have no submarines fit to accompany the battle fleet on extended operations, nor have we any mine-laying submarines or large submarines of great cruising radius, all of which are vitally necessary.

The work in developing underwater listening devices must be continued with renewed energy.

We believe that great attention must be given in matters of research, experiment, and development in connection with the aviation arm of our national defense.

The use of aircraft for the purpose of patrolling, scouting, and spotting, and for offensive operations, including fighting, bombing, and torpedo attacks, and as a protection to our fleets is, because of the comparative newness of this branch of our national defense, but in its infancy, and for many years to come there must be extensive research and experimentation, with a view to its further development.

We believe that the Nation should give all reasonable encouragement, and where it is deserved and necessary should furnish financial aid to the efforts of scientists, inventors, and makers of both heavier and lighter than air aircraft.

While our naval aircraft during the late war was proved to be equal of any other nation, it is manifest that unless we carry on extensive research, experimentation, and development equal at least to that of other nations, we will find ourselves outclassed in this branch of our naval power.

The proper use of aircraft with our fleet or fleets require an adequate number of aircraft carriers, which we believe the duty of the Nation to provide.

It is agreed that the United States Marine Corps is an essential element of the Navy and that it should be maintained at a strength sufficient to insure the training and concentration of an effective advanced base force on each post of the United States, in addition to the performance of duties aboard ships and at naval stations. We believe that the Navy Department should devote sufficient effort to original research work, designing, and experimenting, so that our Navy may also be maintained on a basis equal to its necessity.

These studies should be carried on continuously with a view of developing and improving all classes of combatant crafts, whether used on, above, or below the water.

An appropriation must be obtained sufficiently large, so that not only can the Navy carry out this work, but that special financial encouragement can also be offered to private enterprises and individuals interested in this class of development.

We believe that the personnel of the regular Navy should be at all times sufficient to man all first-line ships which it is necessary to keep in commission to defend our national policies.

The combined number of men of the Regular Navy and the reserve should be sufficient to fully man at war complement all stations and ships which can be placed in service.

We believe that the pay of the Navy personnel should be commensurate with that paid for highly trained work in civil life and should be regulated from time to time by Congress to meet economic conditions.

We believe that the Naval Reserve in all its branches should receive regular and systematic training.

This training should be at such intervals and of such duration as may be necessary to keep officers and men conversant with the duties of their rank or rate, and to keep them familiar with the instruments and machines which they will be called upon to use in time of war.

To be efficiently trained the reserves must have opportunity to be with the fleet in its operations to obtain experience in ordnance and seamanship, or at various bases to obtain experience in aviation.

Competition, which is the basis of all successful development, should be encouraged between the reserves and Regulars in athletics, target practice, signals, etc.

We believe that a Naval Reserve officer of rank and experience should be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy to have complete charge of the Naval Reserve Force.

This officer's appointment should be for such length of time as will enable him to establish a policy which will not—as is the case under the present system—be subject to change from time to time as new heads are selected for this department.

"He should be a man of such caliber and experience as will grasp not only the viewpoint, needs, and condition of the Reserve Force, but will be sufficiently familiar with the regular Navy that he may cause the two branches of personnel to work in harmony.

"He should select as his aids reserve officers of less rank from the different naval districts, to remain on permanent duty in his office, and, in addition, he should organize a board composed of ranking reserve officers from various sections of the country to meet at such intervals as may be necessary to bring to his attention the numerous local questions that may arise.

"It is believed that such a board would express the views and desires of the Naval Reserve Force and keep the chief of the department in touch with the general situation and greatly increase the efficiency of this branch of the service.

"Because of the lack of a proper organization since the war, and because the need of such an organization has not been properly presented to Congress, the Naval Reserve Force has received only a wholly inadequate appropriation, and we believe that this inexpensive, efficient, and much-needed arm of the service has been unfairly treated.

"We believe that there should be complete and sufficient naval bases on each coast.

"It is urgently recommended that there be one main naval base on each coast; each of these bases should be sufficiently large to accommodate our entire Navy and should be of a purely military nature, free from all industrial work which is beyond the capacity of the repair ships of the fleet. Work beyond the capacity of repair ships should be done at industrial bases.

"The main or primary bases should have ample dock space, storehouses, barracks, and recreation and drill grounds. Reserve ships should be based there when not undergoing repairs and they should be the homes and mobilization centers of the reserve personnel.

"On each coast there should be secondary naval bases, with operating bases for destroyers, submarines, and aircraft at strategic points.

"We believe that war plans should be worked out in detail and orders issued in anticipation of instant mobilization.

"It is not enough that general plans should be on file in Washington. Every reserve officer should have orders indicating where he is to mobilize, and where possible he should know what duty he is expected to perform.

"Every merchant vessel should carry sealed orders, indicating what she is to do if she received a wireless message that we have become involved in war.

"Without these detail plans a mobilization would be accompanied with the utmost confusion. The country must have a ready Navy behind whose line complete national mobilization can be effected. Never again can we hope to prepare behind the fleet of another nation.

"We believe, with our late commander, Col. Galbraith, that 'The growth, maintenance, and prosperity of American shipping must be close to the heart of every patriotic American citizen.' The American Legion heartily subscribes to the motto 'Keep the Stars and Stripes on the Seven Seas.' The preamble to our constitution pledges us to God and country, and an adequate merchant marine is a national asset in peace and a necessary weapon in war.

"We believe that the best interests of our country require that the Navy and merchant marine be closely united, and commend the uniting of the heads of the Navy Department and Shipping Board under one roof.

"After due deliberation, your committee respectfully submits the following report:

"Your committee recommends that a bill be prepared and presented by the appropriate committee or committees to Congress providing that a Naval Reserve Force be created in accordance with the terms of the foregoing portion of the report, and further providing that those members of the Naval Reserve Force who were disenrolled by order of the Secretary of the Navy on September 29, 1921, be reinstated in the same class or an equivalent class of the Naval Reserve within six months from the passage of said bill, and that such members of the Reserve Force as shall be reinstated within the above time shall be so reinstated without physical or professional examination and shall be credited with continuous services from September 30, 1921."

The following amendment was accepted:

"Resolved, That the American Legion, in national convention assembled, is opposed to the proposed reduction in pay in the United States Navy and calls upon Congress to maintain the present state of pay in the United States Navy."

The report with amendment was carried.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MEMORIALS.

"Your committee reports that at the Cleveland convention the American Legion executive committee was instructed that a memorial be erected in memory of our fallen comrades who were slain in Centralia, Wash., on the first celebration of Armistice Day. Nothing was said about the cost or character of the proposed memorial. After a careful review of the finances of the country and of the American Legion it was felt that an amount not to exceed the sum of $10,000 would be the amount appropriate for this national body to appropriate. Therefore it is resolved that the plan of the Department of Washington for the erection and financing by them of a national memorial, of an auditorium to be erected in Centralia, Wash., at a cost not to exceed $450,000, be approved, and that the $10,000 requested by your national memorial committee be used as an entrance or dome. This amount shall be delivered only when the Department of Washington shall have raised a sum of $150,000, which must be accomplished within 18 months next following the date of this convention.

"The following resolution is presented for your consideration by the National Memorials Committee:

"Whereas there is in progress of organization in the various communities of all parts of the United States various projects which have been termed 'memorials'; and

"Whereas it has come to the attention of your committee that some of these projects are purely commercial; and

"Whereas the indorsement of many posts and departments has been sought to further these projects; and

"Whereas the indiscriminate indorsement by the several posts and departments might bring into disrepute the organization as a whole: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that when a post or department is requested to indorse and sponsor any project for the erection of a memorial, the plan of financing, construction, and maintenance of said memorial might well be submitted to the national memorials committee in connection with the national executive committee for its counsel and advice.

"The question of war records was referred to the national memorials committee before the appointment of the national historian. For that reason the following resolution was submitted for your approval:

"Whereas the American Legion is vitally interested in the securing and preservation of the archives of our National Government: Now be it therefore

"Resolved by the American Legion (in convention assembled), That the American Legion urges the proper legislation for the erection of a suitable repository for all national archives where they may be safe from any future possibility of fire, vermin, or other causes for their destruction."

The following resolutions were likewise submitted:

"Whereas there has been pending in Congress for some time legislation relative to the erection of the George Washington memorial; and

"Whereas it has been proposed that this memorial should be changed to include within it a memorial to all the men and women of the recent World War; and

"Whereas it is believed that this is not the proper time for the erection of a memorial until adequate legislation has been enacted for the disabled and unemployed and compensation: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the American Legion (in convention assembled), That we do protest against the erection of any public building by or with the consent of our National Government on any Government land in any way designed to commemorate the men and women who served in the World War, until proper and adequate legislation has been enacted for the relief of the disabled, first; the unemployed, second; and adjusted compensation, third.

"Resolved, That this convention advocate the use of granite instead of marble for the headstones for the graves of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines: Be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the War Department."

All above motions carried.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

"We recommend that the annual dues for 1922 of the American Legion shall be $1 per annum and that in the event the member joins after July 1 and before October 1, his dues shall be 75 cents, and in the event he joins after October 1 his dues shall be 50 cents.

"We recommend that the national executive committee shall be authorized to appropriate for operating expenses of all divisions which cover the activities of national headquarters during the ensuing year a sum which shall not exceed the total sum received during the entire year from membership dues, income from the trust fund, and profits earned by the emblem division; that any profits earned by the American Legion Weekly during the ensuing year shall be disposed of by the national executive committee, as follows:

"Fifty per cent of the net profits of the American Legion Weekly shall be set aside as a reserve fund to be used in emergencies only.

"Fifty per cent of the net profits of the American Legion Weekly shall be distributed to the departments in proportion to the paid-up membership of each department.

"Your committee recommends to the national executive committee and to the officers elected for the ensuing year a most rigid program of economy and a material reduction in the general expenses incident to the conduct of affairs in any way connected with the American Legion Weekly.

"Your committee recommends that the national treasurer prepare a budget to submit to the finance committee of the next convention, covering the estimated expenses of all departments for the ensuing year.

"Your committee recommends that the national adjutant place before the finance committee of the national convention of 1922 a copy of a report of the finance committee submitted to the previous national convention, together with a statement of the duties and functions to be performed by the finance committee.

"Your committee would state that, after considering recommendations from several State departments, that the annual dues be reduced or that the proportion of the annual dues allotted to the American Legion Weekly be reduced, we feel that no reduction should be made at this time in the matter of the annual dues because of the emphatic recommendations of the management of the Legion Weekly that any reduction in their allotment would curtail the efficiency of the magazine and interfere seriously with contemplated program of betterment for the Legion Weekly, and involve complications in regard to second-class mailing rates, and after questioning the national treasurer, the national adjutant, and the chairman of the finance committee of the national executive committee, we are satisfied that any reduction in the dues of the national organization would result in a curtailment of the activities of national headquarters, which would not be desirable.

"Your committee understands that several departments are facing acute financial conditions and we are informed that in these States comparatively small department dues are charged; therefore, we recommend that it be suggested to such departments that they give serious consideration during the ensuing year to a policy of adjusting their dues to adequately meet necessary operating expenses of their departments."

This report was adopted.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

The following report was adopted:

"We approve the military policy outlined in the national defense act as amended June 4, 1920, and that we further urge upon the Congress that sufficient funds be appropriated for the following purposes:

"(a) Organizing and training of National Guard and reserve units and individuals, in the manner outlined in the said defense act.

"(b) The prompt installation of suitable accommodations at the general and special service schools to provide for the housing and training of a sufficient number of officers and noncommissioned officers of the National Guard and organized reserves to meet the requirements of the national defense act and amendments thereto.

"(c) To continue citizen's military training camps as now inaugurated and provide for increased attendance thereat."

The report reiterated the Legion's policy that all persons who have been duly convicted of traitorous or seditious acts be required to serve in full the sentences imposed upon them for such acts and that no reprieve, pardon, or parole be granted to them by Executive clemency or any other means.

The committee also resolves that the time for making recommendations for, and the awarding of the congressional medal of honor, the distinguished service cross, and the distinguished service medal for services in the World War, be extended for a period of five years after the declaration of peace by the United States; and that the law which allowed men who had been previously recommended for the congressional medal of honor, but failed to receive the distinguished service cross, be changed so that the law shall apply to all persons now in or who have been honorably separated from the military service of the United States.

The report recommended the appointment of a committee by the national organization of the Legion to study the question of universal draft in time of national emergency of all persons capable of military and industrial service, together with the universal draft of land, material, plants, and capital suitable for preparation and prosecution of war, and report the result of the study to the next national convention.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON REHABILITATION.

The committee on hospitalization and vocational training reported conditions in matters of hospitalization, compensation, and vocational training. Its research work demonstrated the lack of hospital facilities and contributed in great measure to the action of Congress resulting in the appropriation of $18,600,000 for building new and improving existing hospitals. It interested the leading medical men of the country in the hospital situation, with the result that a committee of hospital consultants to the Secretary of the Treasury was appointed. This committee, known as the White committee, consists of the following medical experts of national standing: Dr. William Charles White, Dr. F. K. Billings, Dr. George H. Kirby, and Mr. John G. Bowman.

The committee report follows in full:

"Drs. Salmon and Pattison of the committee cooperated with the White committee along very active lines and devoted their time and attention to its work for many weeks. The committee of hospital consultants expressed its great satisfaction with the cooperation it received from Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, who firmly resisted local political influences asserted through Members of Congress and others. The comprehensive hospital program outlined by the White committee is of inestimable value to our wounded and disabled comrades. The allocation of the $18,600,000 fund made, as it is, on a scientific basis has resulted in the establishment of an adequate hospitalization program. At the conclusion of the last meeting held by your committee, during which a conference with the hospital consultants had taken place, the following resolution was presented and unanimously adopted:

"'The committee on hospitalization and vocational training, after duly hearing a report from the consultants of the Secretary of the Treasury, desires to record its appreciation of the progress made and the work accomplished by such committee in allocating the money recently appropriated by Congress for the expansion of existing Federal hospitals and the construction of new hospitals for ex-service men.

The committee highly approves the action of the consultants, chosen from specialists of the country, to advise of the location and type of hospitals to be erected under the congressional appropriation, and would urge upon the Secretary of the Treasury that he request the consultants to recommend to him such additional provisions as, in their judgment, after further careful study, may seem necessary to complete the hospital program for ex-service men.'

"The national adjutant is requested to forward a copy of this resolution to every post of the American Legion.

"Your committee developed the thought of a unified and decentralized service, and its ideas were incorporated first in the Rogers bill and then in the Sweet bill.

"Your committee was represented at the various congressional committee meetings charged with relief legislation.

"It is also represented before the Dawes Commission and was of material assistance in framing the Dawes report.

"Your committee has been represented at the hearings of the select Senate committee appointed to investigate veterans' relief. C. W. Wickersham, jr., of your committee, is acting as counsel to assist the Senate committee in securing the facts regarding veterans' relief.

"The committee solicited and received from State departments of the legion reports on conditions in local institutions and, where necessary, demanded improvement at the hands of the Government, in many instances securing highly satisfactory results.

"The committee approved and encouraged the use of national military homes as hospitals for our men when adapted for such use by suitable alterations and improvements. Those homes which have since been converted wholly or in part into hospitals promise to be a valuable asset in the hospitalization program.

"Your committee conducted an extensive correspondence among its members and various governmental officials on many questions involved in its work, in this manner reaching conclusions of material benefit without the necessity of calling a meeting of the committee, thus avoiding the expense incident to such assembly.

"The chairman and individual members held a number of conferences with representatives of the Government concerning the operation of the bureaus necessary to changes of administration and legislation, etc.

"It held two extensive meetings lasting two days each—one in Chicago and one in Washington—at which time Government representatives were present at its deliberations and were made cognizant of its conclusions.

"In making its recommendation to Government officials and demanding a change in legislation your committee pointed out from time to time the following conditions as they existed prior to the passage of the Sweet bill:

"(1) The deplorable conditions existing in contract hospitals in which a large proportion of disabled veterans is still receiving treatment.

"(2) The fallacy of the principle of housing and treating disabled veterans in contract hospitals.

"(3) The harm occasioned by unwarranted and unfounded reports regarding a large number of vacant beds being available for the use of our men. In this connection particular attention was called to the fact that an 'available' bed in a general hospital is not 'available' for a tubercular or insane patient; that is not a question of availability of beds as such, but rather of the availability of institutions specially equipped for the treatment of tubercular and insane patients, of which institutions there is a dire shortage throughout the States and communities.

"(4) The necessity of the early passage of the Sweet bill in order to bring about a unified service under the supervision of one person of considerable ability and breadth of vision, who is genuinely interested in the sufferings of disabled veterans.

"(5) Absolute and immediate decentralization of the Government activities to make possible close contact with the men in the field, with authority in the hands of the local officers to pass locally (rather than in Washington) and in one office, on each man's needs, whether it be for hospitalization, compensation, vocational training, or a combination of all or any of the three.

"(6) The inability of the Government to secure high-grade medical personnel on account of the low salaries offered and the general lack of physicians and nurses trained for the special work of caring for disabled and wounded veterans; the advisability of an increase in the salary schedule of the Government for expert medical service, particulary for the heads of sections such as the neuropsychiatry and tuberculosis; and the advisability of establishing training centers for doctors and nurses engaged in caring for these types of patient.

"(7) The desirability of establishing a system of personal service by means of a section independent of the compensation and medical sections and under the supervision of a trained social service worker, a social service representative to be placed in each district office, with such assistants as would be required to follow the men in and out of hospitals to guide them in choosing vocational training and to assist them in adjusting home affairs, and generally to aid in the rehabilitation of the disabled.

"(8) The necessity of cooperation with the district and local sections of the Red Cross dealing with disabled ex-service men and their families, in order that, instead of duplication of effort the personal service of the American Legion may effectively supplement the effort which in many localities is still maintained at a high state of efficiency by the American Red Cross.

"It is a source of satisfaction to be able to report that, at the annual convention of the American Red Cross held in October of this year at Columbus, a resolution was passed calling upon the central committee to authorize a continuance of personal service by local chapters to disabled ex-service men and their families.

"(9) The benefits derived from the increased hospital facilities speedily furnished by the conversion of the National Military Homes into suitable hospitals and the splendid cooperation received from the board of governors of such homes. The members of the board made prompt response to all requests and have successfully overcome a number of distressing obstacles."

It was also resolved to approve the conclusions of the White committee of consultants and the Walsh committee of the United States Senate calling for appropriations to complete the hospital program.

The convention adopted the following report:

"(10) The necessity for further appropriations at the earliest possible moment to complete the hospital program as outlined by the White committee.

"A great many difficulties have been experienced by our men in the matter of compensation, due in the main to the old system of passing on all claims in Washington and to the fact that the Government demands proof that the disability is traceable to the service. Delays in awarding compensation were chiefly due to the fact that examiners in Washington who passed on the individual case had no opportunity to see the man or to inform themselves concerning his environment. The operation of the Sweet bill, consolidating the activities of the Government under one head, decentralizing activities in the field, and making other changes in the law will, it is hoped, improve the situation.

"There were few complaints from men regarding their treatment in matters of vocational training prior to the passage of the Sweet bill. As to results obtained in their rehabilitation, your committee has been unable to obtain sufficient data from which to reach definite conclusions. The Veterans' Bureau, of which the rehabilitation section became a part, has failed up to the present time to furnish your committee with the details of its program for the future. Such information has been requested. Your committee has been obliged, therefore, to pursue its individual study of the subject and has under consideration the following features regarding vocational training:

"(1) Eligibility for training. Fairness to the prospective trainees and to the Government of the present methods for ascertaining eligibility.

"(2) The organization and personnel of the Vocational Training Section of the Veterans' Bureau.

"(3) The establishment by the Government of further training centers for the instruction of ex-service men, thus establishing standards for training in public (non-Federal) and private institutions.

"(4) Advantages and disadvantages of theoretical and practical training, and, coupled with this, the general question of placement training, the means of obtaining employment at the expiration of the period of training, and the advisability of establishing a section for that purpose.

"(5) The advisability of appointing a committee for consultants to advise the Government on the entire scope of vocational training as applied to ex-service men.

"Certain persons, who are not well-wishers of disabled men generally, have attempted to create the impression during the last year that a large proportion of claimants for hospitalization or compensation are exaggerating their disabilities, or otherwise attempting to secure relief to which they are not entitled. Such harsh statements as 'defrauding the Government,' such epithets as 'gold bricker,' 'compensation chasers,' etc., have been used in a manner to indicate that such incidents are common, rather than extraordinarily rare. Your committee has carefully investigated the subject and has no desire to evade the fact that, among discharged ex-service men, there are to be found, as in any other group of human beings, those capable of perpetrating frauds. The detection and punishment of such persons is necessary as much in the interest of disabled men as in the administration of the law. Your committee believes that fraudulent claims are as infrequent as cowardice or self-inflicted wounds were in the Army, and that unduly fixing attention upon a few unworthy men among discharged soldiers is as unjust and harmful to the others as it would be to fix attention upon those who failed to perform their duties while in military service.

"Your committee has not been unmindful that women as well as men who served in the Great War are eligible to the benefits of hospitalization, compensation, and vocational training. Altogether, as nurses, field clerks, yeomanettes, etc., approximately 34,000 women were with the colors. About 600 of these women are receiving compensation from the Veterans' Bureau and 240 are in hospitals. Your committee has recommended that the best type of hospital care be provided in private hospitals for these women.

"The Veterans' Bureau came into existence with the passage of the Sweet bill, which became a law on August 9, 1921. On the same day the President appointed the director of the bureau. Every activity of the Government concerned with the various phases of the problem of the disabled man has been merged in the bureau. The director is given broad powers, among which is the right to delegate authority to others. The scheme of organization of the bureau represents the views of your committee and the American Legion; but the extent of its beneficial results depends almost entirely on the attitude of the director and his sense of responsibility to the Government and to the disabled man. The bureau has not been in operation for a sufficient length of time to warrant the committee in drawing any conclusions regarding its usefulness and accomplishments. It was expected that the service would suffer in the process of making changes in personnel and in consolidating the files. Lack of confidence, however, has been expressed in some quarters because of the belief that certain appointments are being made on the basis of political preferment rather than efficiency, and that signs of conflict between the bureau and other governmental agencies furnishing hospital facilities are already evident. Further study of the situation is imperative.

"It is realized that the great danger connected with any high degree of centralization is that it offers an unusual opportunity for the extension of political powers, but your committee has confidence that the deep-seated desire of the American people to have their disabled veterans dealt with fairly and justly will deter politicians from seeking to make use of this centralization for the advancement of their own personal interests. We believe it is the duty of the American Legion to be continually on guard so as to prevent any attempts to interfere with the work of the new Veterans' Bureau by political influence.

"Your committee makes the following recommendations:

"(1) That all committees of the Legion heretofore concerned with different phases of the problem of the disabled soldier be abolished and that one committee be appointed charged with responsibility in the entire field, said committee to be known as the committee on rehabilitation of veterans.

"(2) That the Veterans' Bureau be urged to evolve and make public without delay its program of rehabilitation, having in mind the necessity of approaching every case with the man's complete rehabilitation as the end in view and of considering his needs through one individual and at one time, whether they be for hospitalization, compensation, or vocational training, or any combination of the three. A survey of the situation in the United States and in the allied countries might help the Government in reaching an enlightened conclusion.

"(3) That Congress be urged to complete its hospitalization program in accordance with the recommendations of the White Committee, and with the end in view that, subject to needed exceptions, all disabled men receive treatment in Government hospitals.

"(4) That in carrying out the provisions of the Sweet Act authorizing decentralization same be effective to the extent of allowing the disabled man to draw his award locally as soon as it is adjudged in the field and until it may be changed by a decision in Washington.

"(5) That sufficient pay be allowed and other means taken to secure the highest possible medical and nursing personnel in administrative positions and in hospitals, and that training centers be established to educate members of these professions for the service. Also that sufficient personnel be employed in the field to carry out decentralization.

"(6) That a section of personal social service be effectively established.

"(7) That in each district a committee of consultants be appointed, consisting of professional and leading business men who are members of the American Legion, for the purpose of advising and cooperating with the district manager.

"(8) That the Veterans' Bureau be urged to develop and utilize to the fullest possible degree the hospital facilities of the national military homes.

"(9) That the American Legion continue its interest and active cooperation with the Government. In the past Government representatives have cooperated and it is hoped that the Veterans' Bureau and its director will show a like inclination.

"(10) In order that the Legion may offer the most effective assistance and in order that its attitude may in no way embarrass the Government, attention is called to the following:

"(a) Post commanders have frequently allowed local influence and incomplete information to affect their judgment in dealing with complaints, and this has sometimes resulted in action detrimental to the welfare of our men. Independent action of local posts on general matters is not productive of good results and is often embarrassing to the Government. Suggestions regarding the desirability of or necessity for a hospital or its location should be transmitted to national headquarters to be taken up by that body with the committee of hospital consultants, which is fully informed, active in the field, and enjoys the confidence of the Government and the Legion.

"(b) Local posts and individual members, without considering the problem as a whole, frequently issue unfounded statements and bitter criticisms against individuals in the employ of the Government, when, in fact, such officials at times, like the disabled veterans, are suffering from lack of adequate hospital program and inefficiency of administrative methods. It is recommended that all complaints and criticisms directed against hospitals or individual representatives of the Government be made to national headquarters, which, after due consideration, will take action based on its knowledge of the general and specific situation.

"(c) There are certain cases where the Government, in order to preserve the good name of an institution or to protect the balance of the patients, has been compelled to institute drastic measures against men who frequently violate reasonable regulations. Such offenders resent disciplinary measures and often unjustly criticize Government institutions and officials through the medium of local posts of the Legion. Your committee urges that such complaints be lodged with the national headquarters, which will investigate and take the proper course of action.

"(d) In general, all posts are urged to entertain that confidence in national headquarters which its keen interest in the disabled man deserves and to refrain from ill-directed and indiscriminate criticism against the Government.

"In conclusion your committee would feel that it failed in its duty if it neglected to remind the members of the Legion generally that the problems connected with the care of our disabled comrades have not yet been solved. Thirty thousand of them are to-day in hospitals, a greater number than at any time since the armistice. Acute diseases and minor injuries have been successfully dealt with, but of those in hospitals to-day a large majority are suffering from serious disorders which may result in their death or in lifetime invalidism. While others may tire of the burden imposed by the care of these men and popular interest grow cold, the American Legion must never permit its interest to diminish or its energies in their behalf to lag until to the last one has been brought all the resources that modern science can provide for the cure or amelioration of the diseases from which they suffer. However the Legion might succeed in other activities, it will fail if we do not continue to discharge our obligation to these comrades."

This report was adopted.

MISCELLANEOUS RESOLUTIONS.

A series of resolutions was passed by the convention. They are:

"Resolved, That we urge the passage of H. R. 8062, providing for increase of compensation for attendants and nurses of blind, legless, and otherwise disabled veterans requiring nurses and attendants from $20 to $50 per month.

Resolved, That national headquarters concentrate its attention on the question of unemployment and do everything within its power to bring about the employment of the greatest possible number of ex-service men.

Resolved, That the Director of the Veterans' Bureau refrain from reducing the present $100 per month pay to the trainees of the bureau. The present cost of living will not permit of any reduction: Be it

Resolved, That the American Legion advocates the plan allowing increased pay to totally disabled men requiring a nurse or attendant, as recommended at the second national convention September, 1920, at Cleveland.

Whereas ex-service men residing in the Philippine Islands are frequently compelled to pay as much as 15 per cent more than the face value of their check in order to make payments on war risk insurance to the Government bureau at Washington; and

Whereas such rate of exchange operates unfairly and discriminates against the ex-service men in the Philippines: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That authority should be granted to United States finance officers to issue in the Philippine Islands, for the purpose of paying premiums to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, United States Treasury checks for exchange in Philippine currency without any charge for exchange.

Resolved, That in the matter of Government trainees successful employment should be the ultimate goal and that institution training alone should not be considered as a complete job of rehabilitation.

Whereas the schedule of disability ratings now in effect in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance does not clearly define the symptomatology and clinical courses of tuberculosis which would determine an actual total and permanent disability: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of Arizona, through its executive officers, urge the enactment of legislation which would permit a total and permanent disability rating to Bureau of War Risk beneficiaries suffering from tuberculosis, based on a schedule of ratings sufficiently adequate to include the incurrence, progress, complications, and effect of the disease.

Whereas uncertainty of length of service and the consequent inability to provide for prudential considerations of the future can not fail to impair the morale of reserve officers detailed to duty in the care of the disabled soldiers in the United States Public Health Service hospitals; and

Whereas because of this uncertainty the efficiency of the treatment of the disabled is impaired because of resignation from the service and the reluctance of skilled surgeons to enter such service: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That officers now on duty in the United States Public Health Service hospitals in care of disabled veterans be placed in the regular corps of the United States Public Health Service or upon a similar status, with all the rights and privileges that are provided for officers in the Regular Army of the United States Public Health Service.

Resolved, That steps be taken to secure a regulation from the proper Federal authority so that flags may be provided to drape the caskets of all ex-service men who die and are buried at the expense of the Government, said flags to be given to the next of kin of the deceased, as in the case of overseas dead.

Be it resolved, That the American Legion oppose the transfer of the United States Veterans' Bureau to any already existing department of the Government, or newly created department of the Government, and urges that it be continued as at present by law directed an independent bureau under the direction and control of the President of the United States.

Whereas it is of advantage to patients finding it necessary to take future medical treatment: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the American Legion, a recommendation be made to Veterans' Bureau that veterans of the World War who become at any time patients in United States Public Health Service hospitals on their discharge be furnished a written statement of medical findings of patient at time he enters hospital and the exact condition of patient on leaving hospital.

Whereas the Government has made favorable regulations respecting the entry of homesteads by ex-service men; and

Whereas irrigation projects opened to homestead entry have unquestionably proven that ex-service men desire homesteads; and

Whereas many service men have been embarrassed in the entry and development of their homesteads: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we commend the action already taken by the Government in providing homesteads for entry by ex-service men and recommend that further provisions be made by Congress so that homestead entry men may be adequately financed in the entry and development of their homesteads.

Whereas the welfare agencies dealing with the interests of disabled ex-service men in hospitals under treatment in vocational schools and who are having difficulties with funds contributed by the public for the welfare of ex-service men; and

Whereas there are many ex-service men and women now in need of employment who are suitable for such positions, and the purposes of the people subscribing the funds would be more nearly accomplished if the funds that were paid out for salaries went to ex-service men and women; and

Whereas the ex-service men understand each other better than ex-service men understand those who did not serve or those who were not in the service understand the ex-service men, and a mutual understanding will be reached and a relation of confidence obtained so that the organization will better know the men it is dealing with and more efficient service can be rendered the welfare organization by ex-service employees; and

Whereas it is the desire of the American Legion to maintain closer liaison between such welfare organizations and itself by giving the benefit of its experience in advice and the use of its organization in supplementing and assisting the work of the welfare agencies; and

Whereas it is the purpose of the American Legion to get in closer touch with the needs of the ex-service men and opportunities offered them by close cooperation with the welfare agencies and by their members being employed upon the staff of such welfare agencies and their officers advising and assisting the welfare agencies: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the American Legion in convention assembled, That all paid employees of the welfare agencies coming in contact with ex-service men be, as far as such employees can be secured, obtained first from ex-service men and women, and where ex-service men and women are not available for the places the employees be obtained from men and women who were actually engaged in welfare work and in contact with soldiers, sailors, and marines during the war; and be it further

Resolved, That all welfare agencies working among ex-service men should consult with the officer of the American Legion post or posts of the city, town, or county, detailed by such post or posts as its welfare, war risk, or service officer in connection with the employment of such personnel as is contemplated will come in contact with ex-service men.

Whereas The Adjutant General of the United States Army holds that a certificate in lieu of a lost or destroyed discharge certificate can only be furnished to a soldier or his widow; and

Whereas no provision is made for the furnishing of such a certificate to the next of kin of a deceased soldier: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That national headquarters of the American Legion take necessary steps to secure the correction of the present situation.

* * * * * * *

Whereas certain methods employed by the War Risk Insurance Bureau tend to mitigate the justice done to the disabled ex-service men and women; and

Whereas the following changes appear to be necessary to the proper conduct of this service: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Legion, in convention assembled, demand the following reforms in the procedure of the War Risk Insurance Bureau as tending to promote justice toward the disabled ex-service men and women:

1. That the rating of the men be made in the field by the examiners who have themselves made the physical examinations.

2. That in no case shall the compensation of any man be reduced without a physical examination nor until he shall have been notified of the intention of the bureau to make such reduction and shall have been given an opportunity to be heard. (Accepted.)

3. That in view of the provisions of section 300 of the war risk insurance act, which provides that any man accepted into the military service shall be deemed to have been physically sound when so accepted, there should be adopted a rule of the bureau to the effect that any man who can prove that at the time of his discharge he had a physical condition which then or later resulted in physical disability, shall be deemed to have received such condition in the service and in line of duty, the burden to be upon the Government to prove conclusively to the contrary before his claim for compensation is defeated.

4. That the use of stereotyped forms in dealing with particular cases be discontinued, and that where the bureau deems the evidence insufficient in any particular, it specifying in a special letter the respects in which it deems such evidence insufficient so that the claimant will know just what is necessary to complete his case.

Whereas during the late World War the Government of the United States afforded to every man regularly enlisted and enrolled in the service of the United States Army the opportunity to take insurance termed "war-term insurance"; and

Whereas the majority of the men serving in the United States Army did take out this insurance, and either had money deducted from their pay or paid direct to the United States Government money in the form of premiums for the maintenance of this insurance; and

Whereas many men discharged from the service were in no financial condition to carry this insurance after their discharge from the service, due to stringent financial conditions prevailing over the whole United States; and

Whereas many men were discharged from the service with definite service disabilities which prevented them from following any gainful occupation to make sufficient funds to keep up this insurance; and

Whereas it is known nation-wide that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance was delinquent and inefficient in the handling of the ex-service man's claims so that the disabled could receive adequate compensation to pay the insurance premiums; and

Whereas many men were held in hospitals and are still held in hospitals of the United States Army and Navy suffering from service disabilities, and these men have been and will be discharged from these hospitals without sufficient funds to keep up this insurance; and

Whereas the Government saw fit to give a period of grace in which an ex-service man could reinstate on a statement that "he was in good health" up until 18 months after his discharge, which period of grace expired on December 31, 1920; and

Whereas the same consideration should be given to those who were held in Army hospitals after December 31, 1920, and to those who were less fortunate than others, in that conditions did not permit the continuance of the insurance: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion, in convention assembled, That every man who carried term insurance during the late war be given an opportunity to reinstate said insurance within a period of five years following his discharge, providing that he can make a statement that he is in good health, or providing that he can show that the physical condition that would prevent him from making the good-health statement was directly due to a disability or disabilities incurred in the service.

Whereas the United States Public Hospital No. 55, known as the Fort Bayard Hospital for Tuberculosis, located at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., is unfit for occupancy and has been condemned by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Veterans' Bureau and other governmental agencies concerned be urged to provide with all possible speed other accommodations for the veterans now housed at Fort Bayard, and that until their transfer to another institution takes place the Government make all necessary changes and improvements looking to the betterment of the present condition.

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Department of Montana of the American Legion that many ex-service men who have filed claims for compensation with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are receiving notification from the bureau of the disallowance of their claims on the ground that the disability is, in the opinion of the bureau, of less than 10 per cent; and

Whereas in many of such cases, even though the decision of the bureau as to the degree of disability may be correct at the time, such disability may in the natural course of nature develop to the point where it may be compensable; and

Whereas in many such cases the decision of the bureau may hereafter, upon further examinations of the claimant, be determined by the bureau to be erroneous, and such claimants may later be allowed a rating of compensable disability; and

Whereas at best the task of establishing a disability of service origin requires many weeks and in many cases many months of time; and

Whereas as time goes on the time required to make such proof to the satisfaction of the bureau is much greater and becomes increasingly difficult, and in many cases, by reason of the unreasonably strict proof required of the claimant by the bureau, such proof will be impossible: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion, in convention assembled, That we recommend and urge that in every case referred to the first paragraph of the preamble to this resolution be given a certificate by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance that the applicant has incurred a disability in service, so that the service connection of such disability shall be established, and that such certificate when made shall be irrevocable except in cases where it is conclusively proven that the finding of service connection has been induced by the willful fraud of the claimant, and such certificate shall, when the condition of the applicant resulting from such disability shall warrant, entitle the applicant to the hospitalization and treatment by the United States Public Health Service, and to compensation, without further proof of the service origin of such disability.

Whereas the civil service preference laws for ex-service persons do not provide any real preference for ex-service persons, but are dependent upon the observance of the spirit rather than the letter of the law; and

Whereas an executive order of the President could make effective provisions of the veterans' preference laws not inoperative: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion in convention assembled, That we respectfully urge the President to issue an appropriate executive order that will provide all ex-service persons with preference in securing, holding, and being promoted in the classified civil service that their honorable service to their country in the military and naval forces rightfully entitle them to receive.

Whereas the prevalence of tuberculosis among ex-service men has created a problem of most serious proportions, both to the Government and to the American Legion; and

Whereas the National Tuberculosis Association has been generous in its continuous cooperation with the American Legion and the Federal agencies that have been trying to solve this problem and to provide proper care for tuberculous ex-service men; and

Whereas the State and local tuberculosis associations have constantly supported the efforts of the American Legion in securing adequate care for ex-service men and are still continuing with their educational and organization campaigns to reduce the incidence of tuberculosis among ex-soldiers: Be it

Resolved, That the American Legion in annual convention assembled does hereby pledge its unqualified support to the National Tuberculosis Association and its affiliated State and local associations in the fight against tuberculosis which they are carrying on: And be it further

Resolved, That we urge all local posts of the American Legion to cooperate with local and State tuberculosis associations in their several campaigns for the prevention of tuberculosis and especially in the fourteenth annual Christmas seal sale.

The convention was addressed by Mr. Charles Bertrand, president of the Interallied Veterans' Association, and R. B. Maxwell, president of the Great War Veterans' Association of Canada. Mr. Walker, of Washington, presented to national headquarters a photograph of the Legion Memorial Building in Hoquiam, Wash.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

The convention proceeded to the election of officers at 3 p. m. Hanford MacNider, of Mason City, Iowa, was elected national commander, and his selection was made unanimous.

The new commander addressed the convention as follows:

"Fellow legionnaires: I appreciate the high honor and the great responsibility. You know that the strength of the Legion is in the men you represent, in your posts at home, not in national headquarters nor in departments. That is where the Legion is and what we will try and reach.

"We must build this Legion of ours so big and fine and strong and keep it so clean and straight and American that when we ask for certain things for the ex-service man, for the disabled man who must live through the war forever in the homes and hospitals of this country, and for those men who are financially disabled, our communities will say, if the Legion is for it, we will be for it.'

"For that service and with a pledge to you of every economy and all measures possible for constructive progress—for that service I stand to your command."

The following were then elected:

National vice commanders: H. Nelson Jackson, Burlington, Vt.; George L. Berry, Nashville, Tenn.; Raymond O. Brackett, Marblehead, Mass.; Charles S. Kendrick, San Francisco, Calif.; John A. McCormick, Las Animas, Colo.

National chaplain: Rev. E. A. Blackman, Kansas.

The convention adjourned at 6.30 p. m.

[NOTE.—Numerous telegrams of felicitation were received by the convention, but are not printed herewith.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House out of order for five minutes on the charge that American soldiers were hanged in France without a trial and to state the facts with reference to that charge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the charge that American soldiers were hanged in France without a trial. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] if he desires to bring up that subject in the House for general debate? Undoubtedly it will bring forth a general discussion of the whole subject.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman from South Dakota was a member of the committee of the House which very carefully considered conditions surrounding our army in France. That committee and the subcommittee of which he was chairman made a report. In addition to matters embraced in that report they investigated many matters pertaining to conditions in France during the war. The gentleman from South Dakota assures me that he simply desires to make a general statement on the subject, without bringing into question any statements that may have been made by individuals.

Mr. GARNER. I understood that the gentleman said he wanted five minutes in which to make a statement concerning the charge that they were hanged without a trial and to show that it was not true.

My recollection is that the record will show that. However that may be, I call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to the fact—he is responsible for the proceedings of the House—that another branch of Congress is now investigating that particular subject. Of course, if this branch of Congress desires to take it up and consider the matter, investigate it, or deal with it in general debate, then I have no objection. I think the gentleman ought to consider the other branch of Congress and the status of this matter in that branch of Congress before he undertakes to open it up here.

Mr. MONDELL. I have considered that and discussed those matters with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], but after hearing his statement I said to him that, as far as I am concerned, I should offer no objection. Of course, any Member of the House has a right to do that if he thinks the matter should not be taken up for discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, it has been charged that American soldiers have been hanged in France without trial. That charge has been made by men in high position, and, therefore, must have been made upon seemingly responsible representation. The charge has also been made that scaffolds were erected in France and that soldiers, without trial, had been hanged upon these scaffolds. Without attack upon those who make these charges, or in defense of men who strenuously defend them, I can state the facts concerning the charge. I can say unreservedly that I know that no American soldier in France was ever hanged upon a scaffold without a trial and conviction by court-martial. No American soldier was ever shot in France unless at the front, in the face of the enemy, and actually fighting, and then by those who were with him and knew him to be a traitor or a coward or an enemy spy. Although never in my presence, nevertheless I believe I know that enemy spies, traitors, or cowards, or those who were mentally unfit for front-line duty, have been instantly shot. Only Divine Providence can determine to which class they belong.

As chairman of Subcommittee No. 3 on Expenditures in the War Department, a committee which investigated several matters with reference to the World War during the last Congress, these charges came to me, and for several months, as a member of that committee, I made a thorough investigation, because some of the charges were made in such a way as to make it possibly appear that there would be some truth in the statement that American soldiers were hanged without trial.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield, although I have only five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman has made a rather serious charge, if I understood him correctly. Does the gentleman intend to say that under any circumstances where men at the front became deranged, or something of that sort, they were shot by their own men?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I was trying to indicate to the House in very careful language that it seems to be well understood among many members of the American Expeditionary Forces that men who may have been mentally deranged, as I say—and Divine Providence only knows—who may have been traitors, who may have been cowards—nobody can tell—were undoubtedly shot in the front line.

Mr. MONTAGUE. By whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. By men of their own commands. That has never occurred in my presence. I make the statement because I believe it to be true, but I do not want to discuss that particular thing now or to debate it.

Mr. RAYBURN. But we have given the gentleman unanimous consent to answer charges made in the Senate, and it seems to me he here makes charges that would disturb the country probably quite as much or more than the charges that have already been made in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I might say in reply that while it may be a charge that might disturb the country, yet it will not disturb many of the Members of Congress whom I see here, who saw front-line service in a combat unit, and I might mention on the gentleman's side, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS], the gentleman from California [Mr. LINEBERGER], and also I see the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. It will not disturb them because they know the facts with reference to the matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. But I believe in treating all citizens of America upon the same footing.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I can not yield further. In making a thorough investigation of this particular matter I had prepared a statistical abstract, which will be found on page 683 of volume 1, serial 4, of the hearings of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department. By referring to that page and the pages that immediately follow, gentlemen will find about all of the trials by court martial, and the facts concerning all of the hangings that took place in France in the American Expeditionary Forces. Up to the time that the report was made there were nine soldiers who had been hanged, two for murder and seven for rape. I shall not discuss those cases, but any Member of Congress who desires to secure the facts by referring to page 688 of this same report, which I have quoted, will be able to find the statement of Col. White, who made a thorough investigation of those facts, and who states them with reference to these trials by court-martial and with reference to those executions.

Mr. Speaker, I could not keep silent and do not think that any Member of Congress or any member of the American Expeditionary Forces ought to keep silent when a charge of this kind is made. Whether or not we have agreed in all things with the former Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, or with the present Secretary of War, Mr. Weeks, or with the Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in order to finish that statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield if the gentleman will grant me the time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes that I might have opportunity to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's statement has created a bad impression, to the effect that in his judgment men have been shot by their own men because they were cowards, or for whatever cause, because there is no justification in law for such action.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I shall tell the gentleman a particular case to which I refer where—not in my presence—a man was shot and it turned out, so the records afterwards showed, that the man was a German spy dressed in the uniform of an American officer.

Now, unquestionably those cases have occurred many times, as any member of the American Expeditionary Forces knows, and no one can tell as to the exact status of the man that happened to occur to, because the things have gone by and no record could be made.

I want to finish my statement. I have said no matter how much anyone may disagree with the former or the present Secretary of War or the Commander in Chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, I know that not one of those three men would have allowed American soldiers to be hanged in France without trial, just as I know that there is no Regular Army officer and no emergency officer that would allow that to occur; just as I know that there was no sergeant or corporal or other noncommissioned officer in the Army that would have carried out orders to hang men without trial. I think those facts ought to be given to the American public, and I think Members of Congress ought to know where they can secure the complete record.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE] be given permission to speak for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, during my term of service in the Army I served with 10 divisions, supported 10 divisions with the artillery, and never before have I heard that men who were mentally deranged or men who were in their correct senses were shot by anyone of their organization or anyone on their side [applause], nor have I ever heard, sir, that anyone was ever hung without a court-martial. I am saying this in justice to the officers and men who fought in the American Expeditionary Forces. I served, as I say, with 10 divisions. I supported the troops from New England, from Ohio, from Illinois, and from the South, and I do not want the statement made by the gentleman from South Dakota to go out to the country unchallenged "that the officers and men of the United States Army shot and killed some poor, helpless man because, perhaps, he was cowardly or mentally deranged." I have never heard of it, and I think the gentleman's statement is incorrect. [Applause.]

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Times of yesterday headed "Society's duty to drug addicts."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the editorial to which he refers. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Inasmuch as objection has been made to inserting editorials from papers out of the city, I think objection should be made to inserting editorials from papers in the city. Therefore I object.

BODY OF UNKNOWN SOLDIER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of War:

THE SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, November 8, 1921.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
The Speaker, House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: It is contemplated that the body of the unknown soldier will arrive at the navy yard and be received by the Army at 4 o'clock on November 9. The body will at once be taken to the Capitol, arriving there about 5 o'clock, and will then be placed on the catafalque in the Rotunda.

It is further contemplated that the three wreaths for the executive, the judiciary, and the legislative branches of the Government will be presented at 5.30 p. m., as already indicated to you.

This letter is for the purpose of notifying the Members of the House of Representatives, through you, of the time of arrival of the body at the Capitol.

Respectfully,

JOHN W. WEEKS,
Secretary of War.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I have recognition for a minute?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] asks unanimous consent to be recognized for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I in that time ask the gentleman from Wyoming if it is contemplated that the House shall remain in session until the hour mentioned in the communication of the Secretary of War, namely, 5 o'clock?

Mr. MONDELL. I doubt if the House will remain in session that late, although it is possible that it will, for the consideration of the bill before the House. Had the gentleman in mind the idea that the House might wish to visit the Rotunda in a body?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It was my thought, although I do not know whether it is proper to do so or not. Perhaps we might let it go until we discuss it a little among ourselves.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it occurred to me that perhaps individual Members might desire to appear in the Rotunda at that hour. I do not understand that the Senate intends any ceremony.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has expired.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

CONTRACTS CONNECTED WITH PROSECUTION OF WAR.

Mr. RHODES (when the Committee on Mines and Mining was called). Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Mines and Mining to call up the bill S. 843.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 843) to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes."

Accordingly the House automatically resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 843, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering S. 843, which the Clerk will report by title.

The bill was reported by title.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that we are proceeding under paragraph 7 of Rule XXIV, and we are entitled to two hours of general debate. I desire to know whether or not the ranking minority member on the committee has a right to control one-half of the time, or whether some opponent of the measure has that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is limited to two hours, and the gentleman will control one hour on his side and the ranking committee member will be recognized on the other side.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, Mr. Chairman, before the Chair makes that ruling I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the rule specifically says that there shall be two hours of general debate, confined to the subject matter of the bill; one hour in favor and one hour in opposition. As I understand, this bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on Mines and Mining, and that there is no member on the committee who will oppose the bill. Under those circumstances I deem it that the Chair, if there is any person to oppose the bill, will recognize that Member to control the time of the opposition rather than the ranking minority Member who is in favor of the bill. I call the attention of the Chair to the specific language of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the rule, and will recognize some Member of the minority side, or the Member from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], as opposed to the bill.

Mr. WINGO. I suggest that we just follow the rule. The gentleman will be recognized, and at the right time some gentleman opposed to the bill may ask for recognition.

Mr. RHODES. I did not get the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule some gentleman will be entitled to recognition on the minority side in a short time.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I failed to hear a word that the Chairman says.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

Add to the first paragraph of section 5 the following proviso: "Provided, That all claimants who, in response to any personal, written, or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal from any of the Government agencies mentioned in said act, in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce any of the ores or minerals named therein and have heretofore filed their claims within the time and in the manner prescribed by said act, if the proof already filed in support of said claims clearly shows them to be based upon action taken in response to such request, demand, solicitation, or appeal shall be reimbursed such net losses as they may have been found to have incurred and are in justice and equity entitled to from the appropriation in said act, and that the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act be continued available for the purpose named above until all such claims shall be finally settled or disposed of."

With a committee amendment as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled 'An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes,' be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"Add to the first paragraph of section 5 the following proviso: 'Provided, That all claimants who, in response to any personal, written, or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal from any of the Government agencies mentioned in said act, in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce any of the ores or minerals named therein and have heretofore mailed or filed their claims within the time and in the manner prescribed by said act, if the proof in support of said claims clearly shows them to be based upon action taken in response to such request, demand, solicitation, or appeal, shall be reimbursed such net losses as they may have incurred and are in justice and equity entitled to from the appropriation in said act.

"'If in claims passed upon under said act awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts, which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in presenting this bill for the consideration of the committee, I first wish briefly to review the history of this legislation. I trust that every Member on the floor will not only scan the report but will read the letter of the Secretary of the Interior which is set out in the report.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, this proposed legislation comes before the House as the result of many months of effort and as the result of earnest consideration on the part of the committee. I want to make it clear that in so far as the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining is concerned, and so far as every member of that committee is concerned, with one or two exceptions, the claims to be considered come from States other than those represented by your committee. The only object I have in view, in asking the House to pass this bill, is that the Secretary of the Interior, who is clothed with authority to pass upon the validity of these claims, may be enabled to more equitably administer the law.

In other words, the Secretary of the Interior says, as you will see in his letter to me, that there are two certain and specific reasons why this legislation should be enacted. In the first place, the act provides that claims presented by those who made an effort to produce, or who did produce either manganese, tungsten, pyrites, or chrome should be reimbursed for net losses sustained in such effort to produce, provided a request or demand was first made either by the Secretary of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation. In an effort to administer this law, under the literal construction placed upon it by the Attorney General, whose opinion the commission followed, it has been found necessary by Secretary Fall to amend the Senate bill and pass it in its present form without additional amendments.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that in the minds of some Members of this House the question will arise, if we pass this bill, whether the door of opportunity is opened wide through which spurious claimants may present claims and have them allowed against the Government. I see no reason why any Member should be alarmed. In the consideration of cases by the War Minerals Relief Commission there have been comparatively few cases presented for allowances, and of those cases presented for allowance a very small per cent of the claims has been awarded. Therefore, judging the future by the past, there is no substantial reason to believe that in the event this bill is passed in its present form there will be abuse.

I have reviewed this piece of legislation with unusual care, and I want to make this statement, and I trust my colleagues will hear me upon this proposition: Under section 2 of this act every man in the United States who had a claim to present against the Government, over which the Secretary of War has jurisdiction, not only had the right to present his claim to the Secretary of War for allowance but has the right to appeal from the decision of the Secretary to the Court of Claims in the event of an adverse decision. I have a letter before me from the ex-Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, in which he states that up to January 1 of this year there have been filed over 6,000 claims under the provisions of section 1 of this act. I have another letter from the clerk of the Court of Claims in the District of Columbia, in which he states that a large number of cases have reached that court by way of appeal from various departments. If you have before you the original act, I will invite your attention to section 5. You will find, Mr. Chairman, that every war mineral claimant under the provisions of section 5 is denied the right to appeal his case to the Court of Claims or anywhere else in the event an adverse decision may have been reached. This is clearly a discrimination.

Gentlemen, I would go much further than we seek to go under the provisions of this bill. There is no good reason why a war minerals relief claimant should be denied the right to have his case reviewed, or even be given the right of appeal, and on the other hand, give a claimant submitting his claim to the Secretary of War the right of appeal. Hence it is clear that in order for the original act to become a well-balanced and rounded-out piece of legislation the bill that we present to-day should be passed. I therefore submit to the Members of this House that in all fairness to this large class of claimants this bill ought to be passed exactly as it is in order to free the hands of the Secretary, who is trying to administer the law fairly.

You will observe that there are two specific reasons set forth in the letter why this bill should pass. In the first place, the original act provides that all claims must be filed within three months from the effective date of the act, which was March 2, 1919. The Secretary tells us in this letter, and he tells me personally, that there were some claims put in the United States mail prior to June 2, 1919, which were denied by the commission simply because they did not reach the office by 12 o'clock on the 2d day of June, 1919. Therefore we put in the bill the phrase "or mailed," thus allowing the Secretary to consider all claims that were put in the mail within the prescribed time, whether they had reached the office of the Secretary on that day or not.

Another reason which the Secretary sets forth for the passage of this bill is that because of the peculiar phraseology of the act, which provides that the decision of the Secretary shall be final, the Comptroller of the Treasury refused to pay a second award in a certain case where it was found that a mathematical error had been made by the commission itself against the claimant.

I have talked to the members of the commission myself, and have talked to the Secretary of the Interior, and they cite one case, coming from the State of California, in which one Dolbear was the claimant. An award was made in his behalf on a certain date, and he accepted the payment. Later the commission, on its own initiative, discovered that a mathematical error had been made against the claimant in the sum of $2,800. The commission undertook to correct the error by making a second award; but the Comptroller of the Treasury refused payment because in the opinion of the Attorney General a second award could not be paid. Therefore the Secretary urges that this bill contain a provision which will permit his commission to correct its own errors—not errors of the claimant. In other words, either this bill must be amended in the form in which it is presented or the commission is without authority to correct its own mistakes, which is an unreasonable proposition.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not before me the original act. What was the limitation of time as to the filing of claims?

Mr. RHODES. Three months from March 2, 1919.

Mr. CRAMTON. And that has reference only to the filing of claims? There was nothing in the original act as to the mailing of claims, was there? Does the gentleman feel certain that all question has been removed in a matter that seems to be so technical, when the amendment provides that claims heretofore mailed within the time and in the manner prescribed by said act" may be considered, when said act did not prescribe any time of mailing?

Mr. RHODES. The amendment provides that claims mailed or filed within the time prescribed in said act may be considered by the commission.

Mr. CRAMTON. I only want to bring the gentleman's attention to the question. There was a time fixed in the original act for filing. There was no time fixed in the original act for mailing, so there might be a question whether the amendment would accomplish the purpose desired.

Mr. RHODES. There is no question in the minds of your committee, and there is no question in the mind of the Secretary that this language accomplishes the exact purpose desired, so that claims either filed or mailed within the time fixed by the law may be considered by the commission.

Mr. CRAMTON. It seems to me there might be some question about it, but I wish to ask another question, and do not desire to take too much of the gentleman's time. Can the gentleman state, roughly, the amount involved in the 598 claims which appear by the report to have been allowed?

Mr. RHODES. A statement made up in the office of the Secretary of the Interior on the 15th day of October showed that the number of claims on which awards had been made to that date were 380. That was the total number of awards made out of a total of 1,203 claims filed.

Mr. CRAMTON. Leaving how many not yet acted on?

Mr. RHODES. The total number of claims disallowed for all reasons was 779.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the total amount involved in the claims that have been allowed?

Mr. RHODES. The aggregate amount of the 1,203 claims——

Mr. CRAMTON. I am asking the amount involved in those that have been allowed.

Mr. RHODES. It is $3,355,008.37.

Mr. CRAMTON. How much is involved in the amendment with reference to the correction of miscalculations?

Mr. RHODES. If the bill passes in its present form it will give the Secretary jurisdiction to make an amended award in one claim, so far as I know, and that is the Dolbear claim.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is that the total amount involved in the claims or the amount involved in the miscalculation?

Mr. RHODES. That is the claim involved in the question of error in calculation.

Mr. CRAMTON. Your bill provides for two classes of claims, one which was barred because they were received too late and the other where there was a miscalculation, and you want authority in fact to review those cases. Now, when the claim was allowed but there was a miscalculation as to the amount, what is the amount involved in the corrections which are desired to be made?

Mr. RHODES. I know of only one case.

Mr. CRAMTON. How much is involved in that?

Mr. RHODES. Two thousand eight hundred dollars, in round numbers.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is it the gentleman's understanding that the only cases to be reached by this bill are those where claims were mailed in time but not received in time, and claims in which there was a miscalculation by the commission? Is it the gentleman's understanding that no other cases are to be reached by this amendment?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, these are the two specific amendments the Secretary of the Interior desires to be made. In addition to this, if the gentleman will observe by reading the bill and the report, the pending bill broadens the scope of the request and demand provision of the original act. For instance, published requests or demands made by either of the five governmental agencies set forth in the bill would be stimulation. I call attention to the language of the Secretary of the Interior in his letter to me in which he says that in his opinion the Secretary of the Interior has authority under existing law to make awards in all such cases without additional authority, but we wanted to make it definite and certain on that proposition. However, if that is true the addition of these words to which the gentleman refers, according to the view expressed by the Secretary, would not in truth and in fact give him any additional authority, because he says he already has it, and in no event could hurt anything.

Mr. CRAMTON. What are the words that are added?

Mr. RHODES. The words that are added are "written or published, solicitation or appeal," in lines 20 and 21 on page 2.

Mr. CRAMTON. The effect of this is to permit a claim to be considered that arose not from any personal appeal but from an appeal made in a general newspaper publication coming from the Government.

Mr. RHODES. Or from one of the Government agencies.

Mr. CRAMTON. And in response to such appeal there might have been action taken by the claimant that the Government at the time knew nothing about; that is the idea?

Mr. RHODES. I do not know what might have occurred; I assume that is quite probable. But that is not material in this case. The question is, Was the request or demand made by either governmental agency, and did the claimant in response to such demand, solicitation, or appeal produce or attempt to produce any of the specified war minerals?

Mr. CRAMTON. In such cases the effect of broadening it in this respect would only operate as to claims filed or mailed before June 2, 1919.

Mr. RHODES. That is true.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Most of the questions I desired to ask have been answered, but I would like to ask the gentleman this question. Of course, in the new class of claims which will be brought in under the broadening of the language no claim can be included unless the claim was mailed or filed within the time prescribed in the act?

Mr. RHODES. Absolutely so.

Mr. HUSTED. In case a claim was mailed or filed, if it was based on a public request, or what is construed to be a public request, and was denied by the commission on the ground that it was not a direct demand or request, then the claimant would have a right to have his claim allowed?

Mr. RHODES. He would have a right to have his claim considered.

Mr. HUSTED. And an award can be made to him.

Mr. RHODES. Yes. That is the construction which should have been placed upon the act in my opinion by those whose duty it was to enforce the original act, and that is what the Secretary of the Interior says he would have done if he had been administering the law.

Mr. HUSTED. What I want to ascertain is can you give an idea of the amount of these claims that would not come within the original act on account of its limitation which have been denied by the commission, which are pending and in which an award can be made?

Mr. RHODES. There can not be any new claims considered, because all claims have either been mailed within the time or filed within the time, and, to be exact, there can not be more than 779 claims, because that was the total number of disallowances, aggregating $8,522,657.74.

Mr. HUSTED. Would that be the limit of the amount which the commission can award in these new cases that would come in under the broadening of the language?

Mr. RHODES. Yes; for the reason that the statute of limitations bars the filing of additional claims. The time was fixed in the act at three months, and that time expired June 2, 1919.

Mr. HUSTED. That includes everything pending and denied by the commission?

Mr. RHODES. Everything pending and denied by the commission, according to the data that I have in my hand, which I will ask to insert in the RECORD at this point:

OCTOBER 15, 1921.

Number of claims filed within the period prescribed by the act		1,203
Total amount asked for by claimants		$18,131,493.40
AWARDS BY SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.
Number of claims in which awards were made		380
Total amount asked for in these 380 claims		$8,291,203.37
Total amount allowed		$3,355,008.37
DISALLOWANCES BY SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.
Number of claims disallowed		779
Amount claimed in these claims		$8,522,657.74
NO ACTION BY SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.
Number of claims pending Oct. 15, 1921		49
Total amount claimed in these pending claims		$1,317,632.29
Appropriation for the payment of war minerals claims		$8,500,000.00
Total amount of awards to Oct. 15, 1921	$3,355,008.37
Administrative expense to Oct. 15, 1921	301,227.92
		3,656,236.29
Unexpended balance of appropriation		4,843,763.71

Cost of entire working force per month at present time about $2,000.

The cost of administration has never at any time exceeded 2 per cent of the amount involved in the claims.

To this date the awards by the Secretary of the Interior have approximated 30 per cent of the amount asked for by claimants. Should that ratio of awards to claims continue the present appropriation would be ample to pay all awards under Senate bill 843 as amended, as will be seen by the following figures:

Unexpended appropriation		$4,843,763.71
Amount of claims which probably would be reopened under Senate bill 843, including the 610 claims disallowed on the ground of no specific request or demand, not to exceed	$8,000,000.00
Amount involved in pending claims	1,317,632.29
Total	9,317,632.29
If the awards in these claims should be about 30 per cent of the amount claimed, as has been the case in the work to this date, the total of the awards would be		2,795,289.68
Leaving an unexpended balance of		2,048,474.03

Less the expense of administration.

A liberal allowance may be made for a higher ratio of awards to amounts claimed and for additional awards in the future, and the total outlay would still be well within the present appropriation.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the amendment relieve the statute of limitations?

Mr. RHODES. The amendment does not seek to extend the time for new claims to be filed.

Mr. DOWELL. In this provision it makes no reference to the time.

Mr. RHODES. I think it says that claims mailed or filed within the time fixed by law.

Mr. DOWELL. The last paragraph speaks of the reopening of claims that have been passed upon for additional amounts.

Mr. RHODES. I have explained that there is a definite reason for this, because the commission found, in attempting to administer the law, in cases where they made mathematical errors against the claimant and later made a second award in such cases the Secretary of the Interior has authority to make payment, as in the Dolbear case, to which I called attention a few minutes ago.

Mr. DOWELL. But this, of course, would permit the opening up of all cases because of any error that has arisen.

Mr. RHODES. It is a fact that only one case has been reported to the committee in which an error was made, and the commission is without authority to make a second award.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, should not this be limited to the case which was referred to by the gentleman, and prevent the opening up of other claims and the payment of additional amounts that would thereby be allowed?

Mr. RHODES. If I were sure that there was only one case or that there never would be but one case, I would say yes; but inasmuch as there might be another case, as justly entitled to relief as this one, then I would say that there is good reason why it should be left open to permit a correction in all cases, just as to Mr. Dolbear.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not this encourage all those who have had claims passed on, and not a sufficient amount allowed, to apply for a reopening of the claims, to have them reviewed again by the commission?

Mr. RHODES. That is a pertinent question, but a careful examination of the bill and the report will indicate that that provision of the act can bring no new cases before the Secretary or his commission for review, except where a mistake has been made, and that has nothing to do with the merits of the case.

Mr. DOWELL. I read from the last portion of the paragraph:

or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts.

Mr. RHODES. Certainly, and why should he not? If an error was made, a mathematical miscalculation, why should it not be corrected?

Mr. DOWELL. Of course, a miscalculation may have many interpretations. It might not be a mere adding of figures, but it might be because certain phases of the claim had not been considered, and, therefore, there was a miscalculation. It seems to me that the language might be subject to criticism; that it opens the door wide to permit every claimant who has not received the amount he thinks he should have to apply again and have his case reviewed by the commissioner, and under this the commissioner must review his claim.

Mr. RHODES. In response to that statement I would say that I perceive the point raised by the gentleman from Iowa, but in the mind of the Secretary of the Interior and in my own mind there is no such danger under this provision of the bill, and no cases except those arising out of mathematical errors could be considered.

I know that is the way the Secretary discussed it with me, personally, and I know that is the manner in which his representatives have discussed it with me, and I assume that they know the facts better than I do. I am generous enough to yield to their judgment on this proposition, and in a letter to me from the Secretary, dated the 4th day of this month, he begs for action by Congress in order to bring this matter to a determination so that the business of the commission may be wound up.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I have promised time to five or six colleagues, and I have only one hour. I understand that I have already consumed 20 minutes. Therefore, I ask gentlemen to desist or to make their questions just as short as possible. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman knows that we have passed legislation for the relief of all kinds of men who dealt with the Government during the war—the Shipping Board interests, the people who dealt with the War and the Navy Departments. If we include in this bill a provision that mistakes made by miscalculation shall be reconsidered under and by virtue of a new authority beyond that which the department already has to correct errors, does not the gentleman think we will have a flood of legislation offered here to correct alleged miscalculation in all these matters to which we have granted relief?

Mr. RHODES. I know nothing about any of those claims except the war minerals relief claims, and enough time has passed since the effective date of this act to demonstrate the fact that there is not going to be the large number of claims arise that the gentleman fears. I do not believe there is any danger.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If there was actual miscalculation, a mistake in figures, in mathematics, does not the gentleman believe that the Secretary of the Interior and the department would have the same authority to correct such errors now?

Mr. RHODES. The Secretary tells me in his letter he has no such authority, and I know he has not, because I have read the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury. In fact, that is why he asks us to put in this provision. In other words, under existing law they can not pay these second awards. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What is the amount of money that the department figures will be paid out on the strength of this amendment?

Mr. RHODES. I gave that for the RECORD a few minutes ago. I stated the total number of disallowed claims——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not talking about that, but I want to know whether or not the Department of the Interior has already made a preliminary survey of claims that were going to be paid under this amendment which were not made under the prior law.

Mr. RHODES. And I am trying to tell the gentleman that. Before I make the statement I want to lay the foundation for the complete answer by saying that we have only 779 cases disallowed. The aggregate amount of these 779 cases is $8,000,000 in round numbers. Judging the future by the past, as they have allowed but 30 per cent of the claims actually passed on, the department figures that $2,795,289.68 would be the maximum amount.

Mr. STAFFORD. That may be expended under the purview of this new provision?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say in response to another inquiry that the total amount would be only $1,317,000.

Mr. RHODES. Of course the gentleman has misunderstood me. I said that 49 claims had been rejected because they were not in the office of the Secretary by 12 o'clock on June 2; the aggregate of those claims was $1,317,632.29.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, does the gentleman mean that the total amount, according to the estimate that may be claimed under the phraseology of the proposed amendment, is $2,795,000? Does that amount also include the $1,317,000 which the gentleman has just referred to as being the amount of 49 claims rejected because not filed in time?

Mr. RHODES. It does, at the rate of allowance made up to this time.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] use some of his time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the "gentleman from Arkansas" is a member of the committee, and the report is unanimous. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is opposed to the bill. No member of the committee is opposed to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] for one hour.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is wide open to criticism in matter of detail, but I prefer to oppose it upon general principle.

I am getting tired of voting money out of the Treasury to reimburse war contractors for losses which they sustained because the war ended a little sooner than they expected. On November 11, 1918, when the news of Germany's capitulation came across the sea, our Nation broke out in tumultuous rejoicing. But there were some who went through the form of rejoicing who were not really glad. They had war contracts out of which they were making immense profits. This bill is in part for the purpose of reimbursing some of those men.

Most of the men who will benefit by this bill are men who went into a business expecting to make immense profits out of it and failed to do so merely because the war ended too soon for them. If this proposal was that our Government should reimburse everybody who lost money on account of the war ending too soon for them, I should regard it with more favor; but it and other bills which have gone before it are intended for the benefit of only a very small class; they are not intended to relieve the great bulk of our people who suffered losses on account of the war. The Government needed the products of our country—minerals, foodstuffs, everything that men could produce—and everything possible was done to encourage men to produce these things. We needed labor for our shipyards and war industries. Men were encouraged to leave their homes and go to distant places and take work. The war ended, such plants were shut down. The workers went out of the shops, left without employment to find their way home the best they could. The farmer, who had devoted himself to the production of wheat, had to take his losses; the cotton grower had to take his losses; men who produced foodstuffs of every kind had to take their losses. No measure has come to the floor of the House whereby it was proposed to reimburse farmers, laborers, or anyone except a small class of war contractors. It is proposed to reimburse only a small class of business men. I am tired of such proposals; I am tired of such discrimination; I will not follow those who advocate it any longer.

Men were taken out of their jobs, taken against their will, and put into the trenches; men were sent to France, and suffered everything that men could suffer. They had their losses; they lost their jobs, their businesses; they lost everything to serve their country. Yet we find when a proposition is advanced on this floor to do a little something in the way of reimbursing the men who served as soldiers for the losses they sustained the same interests—some of the business men who would be benefited by this bill—come forward and say no. They opposed the soldiers' bonus; they struck down the proposal to do something to reimburse men who went to the war and who fought the battles, but they come here and reach out their hands and cry with the daughters of the horse leech, "Give, give to the business interests of the country, that may not have realized on their hopes to the full extent."

I will not vote to make good the losses of business men until Congress has done something to make good the losses of the men who fought the battles of our country in time of war. Let that be definitely understood, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Please excuse me.

Mr. Chairman, homes were desolated by the conscription of soldiers for the war. Mothers and fathers suffered for lack of the support of their breadwinners. Wives wept out their eyes because their loved ones were across the sea. They denied themselves. Agents of the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration went up and down in the land encouraging self-denial. "Work," they said to the laboring man. "Deny yourselves," they said to the people who wanted to eat. For what? So that we might win the war. And people responded as people had never responded before. But now that the war is over, no proposal comes here to help the mother who lacked the necessaries of life when her son was in France; not to help the father, who lost his support and stay; not to reimburse the people who denied themselves and suffered, but to put money into somebody's pocket who lost in an effort to make something out of the Government during the war. I am not for it. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I really prefer to take time to discuss the merits of the bill, but I do not propose to let go unchallenged the unwarranted impeachment of the loyalty, the patriotism of these small miners in the West, which has just been made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON]. That he does not know what he is talking about is indicated by his speech. He evidently has not read the hearings, and he does not know that the only men who are opposing this bill are the men he is wont to denounce at every opportunity on this floor.

The steel companies have gotten theirs; the big claimants that might get something under this bill have gotten theirs. The Hanna Steel Co. has gotten theirs on the identical state of facts that some poor hardworking miners in one western State have been denied. Under the informal war contracts bill steel companies have had millions allowed to them in the way of prospective profits predicated upon the use of some of the ore that is now on the dumps on the mountain sides of the West, and the law that Congress passed was intended to give them only protection against net loss. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that his steel companies have been given some more than net loss. They have gotten prospective profits, and they have refused to live up to their contract to take the ore of the little fellow who is too poor to come east and hire lawyers to sue them and make them take the ore that they refuse to take.

Why did they dig it out? If the gentleman would read the record he would see that in case after case these men said, "No; we will not do this; it is not profitable." But the War Trade Board and the War Industries Board and the Secretary of the Interior, or in some instances agents of the Director of the Geological Survey, as I recall, went around and threatened them with the seizure of their little properties if they did not develop these deposits. We assured them that that law would be passed. Who held that law up at the other end of the Capitol?

I will say to the gentleman from Alabama that one reason why I am favoring this bill is that the Secretary of the Interior can bring suit and recover—as he can not now do under the law—bring suit to recover from some of these large claimants, in order that justice may be done to these little men. A committee of Congress in the last Congress, after hearings for days, after compelling the chairman of the commission to submit to examination by questions of witnesses, found what? What did that committee find? That committee was of the opinion that the commission erred in the application and intent of the act and the application of the law to the facts.

Oh, it is easy for a gentleman to make a demagogic speech against this bill. It is easy for one to make a plea of economy. But if you owed a groceryman, would you go about and say, "I am trying to economize; I will not pay my just debts"? It would be an insult to a man to do it. It is easy to talk about the "big fellow." Who is back of the lobby that is against this bill? I measure my words. A man has been brought here and paid to fight this bill, and when he was met in the lobby of a hotel by one of these poor miners of the West, who is wearing threadbare clothes, and was asked why he was here fighting the bill, said, "I did not know that you were one of these claimants."

Mr. Chairman, it is admitted that that man Moore could not run correctly an adding machine. Out in Mr. KAHN'S district they admitted that they had found a mathematical error. They issued an additional warrant. They could not collect it. In one case Moore read the first line of the printed form in which there was a misstatement.

The answer to that question was intended to determine whether or not they came within the purview of the law and had jurisdiction. He would not read down and find out the fact that the man came within the jurisdiction and purview of the act, as disclosed by answers to subsequent questions. He ruled that he had no jurisdiction and he never considered those claims.

I am not worrying about these big fellows. They will get justice some day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, these big claimants will dun Congress until they get justice, and I am afraid some of them will get more than justice. The man I am thinking about is the little fellow whose claim has not even been considered, but has been treated with contempt; the little fellow who has been approached and told that if he would sell his claim for so much on the dollar it could be sold.

Gentlemen, I tell you I am always candid with the House. We made a report and recommended a bill for a review by the Court of Claims. Who opposed that? Moore, of the commission, kept the door to the Capitol slick as an otter slide, opposing a review of his judicial acts by a superior court. What would you think of a judge if he was afraid to allow the Supreme Court to review his decisions—a judge that not only misconstrued the law but misapplied the facts? Then came along Mr. Fall, the Secretary of the Interior, who says, "If you will enact a law meeting the decision of the comptroller and meet the proposition where Mr. Moore has arbitrarily refused to consider the claims, I can clean them up and get through with them." My main object is to clean up this whole thing as quickly as possible. The gentleman from Alabama is no more tired of war claims than I am. I want to clean it up. If these claimants are given the right of a review Secretary Fall will pass upon their claims. Are you not willing to trust Secretary Fall? I am willing to do it. If a claimant who is denied comes to a Member of Congress and says, "I want you to introduce a private claim for me," then a Member of Congress can refuse and say, "No; we gave you an opportunity, and we have given a new Secretary of the Interior the right to review your claim, and he turned you down." If a committee should be careless and report out such a claim on this floor it would be attacked on that ground. I want the matter cleaned up now. I do not want my successors 20 years from now to have to deal with private claims predicated upon these conditions.

Gentlemen, as a lawyer, as a man who wants justice done, I want to tell you that that unanimous opinion of the committee in the last Congress that these men had entirely failed to comprehend the law of Congress and had failed to apply to its customary rules of interpretation as practiced by the courts and had ignored facts, can not be gotten around. Gentlemen, you can not get around that unanimous finding of that committee that a solemn adjudication of these cases ought to include, at least, the right of review or appeal to the Court of Claims. We ought to do one or the other.

Oh, gentlemen, it is easy to say we are going to economize. It is easy to summon up the bugaboo of some big claimant. I believe that Secretary Fall will be pretty strict when he comes to pass upon these claims. I believe he will go over those cases where the old commission made a second award and issued a second check which was turned down by the comptroller. This will authorize him to take up those cases and issue warrants, and the Comptroller of the Treasury will pass them, because this Congress has authorized him to do so. I believe the Secretary could take up those cases where the claimants had mailed their claims, but they had failed to get into the office in time.

I am surprised to find that any man who pretends to be a lawyer should contend that the time when a claim is received by mail fixes the date of its legal delivery. I had always been under the impression that the delivery to a post office or carrier was delivery to the consignee; but lo and behold, the settled judgment of courts and lawyers in all the past was brushed aside by this man Moore. He said in express terms that he had a man watching the time, with a watch in his hand, and that those claims which were not received by 12 o'clock were rejected. Was he trying to carry out the intent of Congress, which was to make equitable and just settlements? No. He was prosecutor, judge, and everything else, and Mr. Lane admitted that he was temperamentally unfit for the job; and Secretary Lane was chagrined at this man's action and he passed it over to the new administration. Secretary Fall at first thought he could correct it, but he found that under the ruling of the comptroller he could not. He said, "Give me this and I will clean it up and get it out of the way." Gentlemen, you may vote this down if you want to. It is nothing to me, but let us be just and clean this thing up now while facts are fresh. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. BLACK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I am going to take the risk of being overwhelmed as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has been by the caustic criticism of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] for venturing to speak in opposition to this bill and in behalf of what seems to me to be justice as well as economy.

I do not pretend to know the personal weaknesses and failures of various officials who have handled these matters in the department. I have a very high regard for Secretary Lane and Secretary Payne, as well as for the present Secretary, Mr. Fall, and I am going to try to keep to the record.

The bill as presented by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] does not seem to me to be at all the bill presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES]. The bill as presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] is not a bill authorizing a general review of all these cases by the new Secretary because of the incapacity of other officials, but it is a bill to accomplish three purposes, two of them the report states to have been unanimously recommended by the House committee. Under the statement of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] neither of those two is of any very great importance either way.

One is to allow the consideration of claims mailed before the 2d of June, whereas the previous act of Congress expressly stated that only those claims could be considered which were filed within three months. That meant filed with the Department of the Interior. I am constrained to disagree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. The filing of claims within three months of the effective date of the act meant that the claims should be filed with the department, and inasmuch as the whole act was for the purpose of extending a grace to parties who conceive that they have an equitable claim, when we gave them three months in which to file their claims, if they did not come within the terms of the act of grace it seems to me we ought not now to change the rules of the game and permit claims to be considered that did not come within the act.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I have only five minutes. I am very sorry. If I can get more time I shall be very glad to yield.

As to the second class, the correction of miscalculations, I understood from the answer of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] that that involved only one case of about $2,000. The gentleman from Arkansas, however, construes that to be a general review of all these claims of the poor unfortunates in the West who own manganese and chrome deposits, and so forth, and the other things covered by the act. I am constrained to accept the statement of the gentleman from Missouri that it covers only some mathematical miscalculations. That would not be so serious; but when you torture it into a general review of all claims, it becomes of more importance.

But the really serious proposition is involved in the language of the Senate. I find it difficult to follow the view that the evident purpose of the bill as passed by the Senate only was to permit this more liberal construction. The House committee adopted the language of the Senate, and hence I should say the House committee also wanted this "more liberal construction."

Now, what is that more liberal construction? After the war ended there were people who thought they had just claims against the Government. They were not legal claims. They were simply claims in equity, so Congress gave them the authority to file claims where they had incurred expense for the production of the ores and minerals named, upon the request or demand of certain agencies; and in accordance with that language a number of claims have been filed and they have been passed upon. The Secretary of the Interior says he does not think the language needs to be broadened, but the committee fear it does, and so they provide as to all claims heretofore filed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. BLACK. I am sorry, but all the time has been spoken for. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I find that the report on this bill states two reasons for the bill that are unobjectionable to me. One is that where there has been discovered an error by the Secretary of the Interior and he desires to correct it and make an additional award, he may have the right to do so, and that the awards may be paid. That is, of course, manifestly just, and I have no objection to that.

The other is that where a man mailed his claim within the time prescribed by the act, but it was not delivered to the commission in time, he should have his claim considered. I think that is eminently just, because the law of the land has been construed by nearly all courts that when you serve a notice by mail the time that it is deposited in the mail, postage prepaid, is the time of the service. These two requests are unobjectionable, and I want to get them out of the way, and I would vote for a bill carrying those two things.

The other is a more dangerous thing to the United States Treasury. Instead of the language that they have embarked on this business in compliance with the request from the Department of the Interior they insert the language "who in response to any personal, written, or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal from any governmental agency." They have inserted the word "published." It is without question that it was published in all the prints of this country that the Government was in urgent need of all these things. But that did not justify every fellow who had some little equipment which possibly might produce some of these things in embarking in the business because it appeared in the public prints that the Government needed these articles. In other words, it is to be assumed that the Government did not give to the people a request that they embark on these propositions unless there was some probability of their being able to prosecute the work successfully. The Government did not propose to ask anyone who supposed that he had tungsten on his property to go to work and endeavor to develop it where there was no probability of its being successfully developed under the conditions under which he was supposed to proceed.

Therefore this broadens it out to where any fellow who had an imagination that he had any of these things that could be developed to allow him to go on and develop it, and then, if he had a loss, charge it up to the Government. So I shall move to strike out the words "or published" when the bill comes up under the five-minute rule, and insert the word "or" before the word "written," and then it will read "who in response to any personal or written request" embarks upon these things, and so forth. Then you will have the Government charged directly with having solicited these men under circumstances knowing the property and knowing the probabilities whether they could do it successfully or not. It will include those cases where they have asked him to embark on this proposition, and then, if he loses, the Government may be responsible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, the act passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress authorized the Secretary of the Interior to pay net losses to men who produced certain materials during the war—manganese, chrome, pyrites, and something else, I have forgotten what—even though these men had no contract with the Government whatever. But it had to be on the request or upon the demand of some one of the named agencies of the Government—the Secretary of the Interior, War Industry Board, and so on. I thought that bill went a long way, but we passed it because we were told that these men went into the business for patriotic reasons, went into a business which could not be made to pay in normal times, and therefore the circumstances were unusual. Perhaps we were just and did right in going as far as we went in that legislation.

We propose now by this bill to extend the time, so that those men who mailed their claims within the time limited for filing in the original act can have their claims considered. The language of the original act was very definite, and I do not see how anybody could be in doubt about it, but I have no particular objection to this extension, because I realize that in some lay minds deposit in the United States mails is considered a filing with any agency in which filing is required. I have no objection either to that provision of this act which allows a rehearing of a claim and its adjustment if the fault is not with the claimant, but with the commission that made the error.

But there is another provision in this bill which I think is absolutely wrong and unjustifiable, and that is the provision which allows parties to come in here and file claims, or rather allow them to have claims considered, when the basis of that claim is only a published request of some agency of the Government. Just think of it; a mere general request appearing in a newspaper! Why, every industry in this country was stimulated more or less by general requests, and if you allow relief in those cases on the basis of a general request published in a newspaper, you have not any right to deny compensation for loss to any industry in this country which produced goods for the use of the Army, the Navy, and the American people during the course of the war.

Take the farmers, for example. They have a much better right than these people would have on such a basis, because they not only produced at the published request of the Government but also the prices which they received were fixed by law. In the case of these producers of minerals, there was no price fixed by law, and if you pay the loss of these people on the basis of general published requests, how can you deny it to the farmer whose price was fixed by the Government, and who also produced for the purposes of war at the request of the Government of the United States? If you pass this legislation, you are going to open the flood gates for all kinds of claims, and you are going to establish a precedent which will inundate us and which we can not with any shadow of justice deny. [Applause.]

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, our friend from Alabama sees in nearly every measure which is brought before this House a horrible monster—

> A monster of such frightful mien
> That to be hated needs but to be seen.

His object in getting up here is to rend aside the veil which conceals that horrible monster, and when the camouflage is removed we see the horrible monster is that much-despised and hated individual, the American business man. Possibly sometimes the American business man appears to be only a little fellow, a very small and pathetic individual, but he is none the less to be an object of hatred on that account.

Now let us review this war-minerals legislation a little and see what was actually done. The Sixty-fifth Congress passed with patriotic and generous motives the Dent-Chamberlain war contract relief bill, and this is what it said:

> That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation, * * * by reason of producing or preparing to produce manganese, chrome, * * * in compliance with the request or demand of the Department of the Interior, War Industries Board.

And so forth.

Request or demand. Here is a request or demand that went out. Secretary Lane issued an advertisement to this effect:

> Many of the resources of our country lie undiscovered and undeveloped. In these days of great needs and great deeds men are wanted, men of ability, initiative, and imagination, to discover these resources and put them at the Nation's service.

The Director of the Bureau of Mines, Mr. Manning, published an advertisement to the effect that it was not sufficient that we have an amount of ammunition on hand equal to that of the enemy, but that it must also equal and surpass the enemy's ammunition.

The Shipping Board published a statement to this effect:

> If private interest waits until every detail is settled before taking steps to meet the situation, there is danger of vital damage to essential war industries. Patriotism requires that the mining and metal industries do everything reasonable to get projects started at once.

Those advertisements were published. Possibly they were not a demand, but at least they were a request. Following those advertisements and those public notices came agents of the Government, who went into the various mining camps and held meetings. They saw individuals, and they got up at meetings and addressed the owners of small claims, urging upon them as a matter of patriotic duty that they should develop those claims which had long lain dormant for various reasons, impressing upon them in the most earnest and emphatic manner that it was their duty to go out and develop these claims. A great many of them did and some of them did not, and to those who did not the same agents came afterwards and virtually took them by the collar and told them to go out and develop the claims or that they would be taken away from them. Some of those who were slow in starting were, in effect, war slackers, but they did have a personal, written demand, a written contract with the Government to produce their minerals, but the little fellows who were inspired by patriotic fervor, who went out first, did not have that kind of documentary evidence. I know one widow in a Colorado town who invested all of her own money, three or four thousand dollars, who got her friends to put in their savings in order to open her long-abandoned property, and she stood beside the shaft working with the old-fashioned "arm-strong" hoist to pull the ore out of that shaft. She did not herself have any personal written request from any agent of the Government. Her mine was too small for the Government at that time to go after it separately. It was large enough to produce some minerals which would have been most useful to the United States if the war had continued. It was large enough to take all of her money. She did not think it was her duty to wait for a peremptory demand when the importance of the service was made clear to her by the official statements of responsible officers of our Government. But now, by the construction which has been given by the War Minerals Commission to an act of Congress which was clearly intended for her benefit, those who did wait can be reimbursed for their loss while she can not, unless this bill is passed. God forbid that she should be stigmatized as not patriotic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ].

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, in March, 1918, all America was on its tiptoes, as it had been for months; as it was destined to continue to be until November 11, 1918, when the curtain was rung down on the mightiest conflict, the most stupendous tragedy in history.

I know that the metal miners of America were producing to their utmost for wages ranging from four to six dollars per day, while in many other industries wages ranged from $6 to $20. The miners performed every task without a whimper.

The prospector, the individual leaser, and the small mine operator all were shipping ores of copper, lead, or zinc, and most of them managed to come out with at least a small profit, after paying exorbitant prices for dynamite, freight, and haulage and every other item found necessary in the production of ores. These producers of our mineral wealth were on the fringes of civilization—in the most isolated sections of our country.

Then came the clarion call of our Secretary of the Interior, the late Franklin K. Lane:

> WANTED: MEN TO DISCOVER AMERICA.
> Many of the resources of our country lie undiscovered and undeveloped. In these days of great needs and great deeds men are wanted, men of ability, initiative, and imagination to discover these resources and put them at the Nation's service
> The undeveloped resources to which I particularly refer are those which I am most familiar through the activities of the Department of the Interior—metals and minerals which we require in large quantities, which exist in large quantities in this country, and which in spite of this are largely imported from abroad.
>
> We must have chrome, manganese, and pyrite. To produce some 2,000,000 tons of these and other imported minerals from domestic sources will release from three to four hundred thousand tons of shipping for military use.
>
> Will you save ships for the transporting and feeding of our armies by discovering and developing our own deposits of these minerals? We are discovering that many minerals we need we have here in the United States. But we have hardly begun to develop these minor resources. Let us get at it in earnest.
> FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Mining camps and small mining settlements not reached by this appeal were reached by the following editorial, which is taken from the Mining and Scientific Press of March 9, 1918:

> Energetic exploration and intensive development of certain needed mineral resources is earnestly recommended in a circular just issued by Mr. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior, entitled, "How to save ships." The purpose in view is revealed by that caption; ships are too urgently required for transporting troops and supplies to Europe to admit of dependence upon foreign sources of such metals and minerals as can be obtained in this country. Mr. Lane points out that their importation not only diverts shipping from the trans-Atlantic service, but produces a further demand for fuel and mining equipment abroad. The minerals specified are manganese, flake graphite, tin, tungsten, antimony, pyrite, magnesite, potash, and nitrates. A proposal has been made and has received official indorsement for extending Government aid in the exploitation of such deposits, but it has not yet become law. Meanwhile the remunerative prices obtainable for these products should encourage a prompt response quite apart from the patriotic incentive that should bestir every true American to do all that he can.

Then follow posters and circulars, distributed by postmasters and railroad station agents who passed them out and placed them in their windows, on their walls, and bulletin boards.

The following is a copy of a circular issued by the United States Shipping Board May 4, 1918:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
COMMITTEE ON MINERAL IMPORTS AND EXPORTS,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1918.

The shipping situation requires immediate important changes in mining and allied industries. The precise nature of these changes and the agencies and methods through which they will be accomplished are not yet formulated, but there are certain fundamental facts which should be clearly understood.

The acute ship shortage has forced a drastic cut in imports of a considerable number of minerals essential to war industries. Among the more important embargoes of these are manganese, chromite, pyrites, and graphite. Some are already in effect. Others will soon follow.

Ships released in this way, or their equivalents, have gone directly into military use, and with a still greater military program planned and probable further decrease in total ship tonnage, for a time at least, there is little possibility of early reinstatement of ships for mineral imports.

The deficiencies in supply thus caused must be made up from domestic sources. Reduction of imports has been based on careful estimates of the possibilities of domestic production. Estimates have been liberal, and there is not much danger of overproduction. Every ton mined here will save a ton of mineral that otherwise would have to be imported.

The increased use of local ores will require many changes in practice and probably also reduction of less essential uses. Those changes must be accomplished, regardless of cost or difficulties, for the alternative of bringing in supplementary supplies from abroad no longer exists.

Government cooperation will be necessary along several lines. Already attention is being directed to various phases of the problem by the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, the Department of the Interior, the Railway and Coal Administrations, and the Treasury Department. There is pending in Congress a bill to concentrate control over the mineral industries most affected by ship embargoes. While the situation is being actively followed up, there is likely to be a delay of at least several months before it is well in hand.

If private interests wait until every detail is settled before taking steps to meet the situation, there is danger of vital damage to essential war industries. Patriotism requires that the mining and metal industries do everything reasonable to get projects started at once. The necessary Government cooperation may be slow and halting, and mistakes are likely, but as the shipping situation allows no alternative, it is a reasonably safe assumption that the absolutely necessary things will be done in time. In view of these facts, far-sighted management of the mineral industry will not base its calculations for the immediate future on the practice of last year.

In the spring of 1918 the Department of the Interior, the War Trade Board, the War Industries Board, the United States Bureau of Mines, the United States Geological Survey, and the Shipping Board all appealed to American metal miners to search out and produce the war minerals—manganese, chrome, tungsten, and pyrite.

Up to this time for most western points in the United States the price offered at Pittsburgh or other eastern points for manganese, chrome, and pyrite was too low to permit of any cost for mining, let alone profit.

These minerals occurred at many and widely scattered points throughout our country, but for the most part were undeveloped—in no condition for immediate production; but as they could not be mined except at a loss these deposits of manganese, chrome, and pyrite were for the most part heretofore left alone. The prewar price offered for chrome, manganese, and pyrite was seldom in excess of the freight and haulage costs. It is nearly always the prospector, the lessor, or small operator who first takes up these deposits before passing them on to the company or large operator. For this reason the greater proportion of men who will be benefited by the passage of this bill are small operators.

Over 1,200 metal-mining operators abandoned the projects they were carrying on at this time and responded to the Government's appeal for their services and the use of their personal funds, in most cases all they had, in producing these urgently needed war minerals.

It required months to seek out these little developed or virgin deposits, to build roads to them and erect their camp buildings, bring in their mining machinery, and to sink shafts or drive tunnels into the pay ore.

They willingly did all this. They were mostly men beyond the draft age and were doing "their bit" as they saw it—living on the most meager fare, experiencing the heat and sand of the desert and the storms and extremes of temperature in the mountains. Yes; they earned all they could make, and I will swear they obtained very little for all the hard work and sacrifices they made.

It was far into the fall of 1918 before but few of them had reached the point of actual shipment.

These miners—and there are no better citizens anywhere in our land—like all real Americans thanked God from the bottom of their hearts on November 11, 1918, when the news flashed over the world that the war was over, that the armistice was signed.

Within a few weeks, fellow Members of the House, all promises made to these men of the desert and mountains by our National Government were forgotten. Ore unshipped on mine dump or platform has lost all semblance of such through the action of the elements these past three years. Ores en route, aboard railroad cars, were unloaded for ballast or a compromise settlement made between shipper and ore contractor for the big steel companies. No market remained to these prospectors or small operators. All idea that the Government intended to live up to its contract to protect producers and shippers of war minerals was soon dispelled. Let me read to you portions of the act approved October 5, 1918, fully six months later than the date of request and demand made by Secretary Lane:

An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the existence of a state of war it is essential to the national security and defense and to the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy to provide for an adequate and increased supply, to facilitate the production, and to provide for an equitable, economical, and better distribution of the following-named mineral substances: Manganese, chrome, tungsten, etc.

Section 2 authorizes the President to purchase such necessaries, to enter into, to accept, to transfer, and to assign contracts for the production or purchase of same, and so forth, but such sales made during the war shall not be at a price less than the purchase or cost of production thereof.

Provided, That no such contract of purchase shall cover a period longer than two years after the termination of the war.

The President is further authorized upon finding that importation into the United States of any of the necessaries covered by this act is likely to result in a loss to the United States to fix a duty upon such imports to adequately protect the United States from such loss.

Section 3 says that the President is authorized to requisition and take over any of said necessaries and to use, distribute, allocate, or sell the same, and also to requisition and take over any undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated idle land, deposit, or mine and operate such mine or deposit and store, use, or sell the products thereof.

I will complete my statement as a member of the House Committee on Mines and Mining by quoting a few words from H. R. 13274, Sixty-fifth Congress, Public No. 322, passed March 2, 1919.

The Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust, pay, or discharge any agreement, expressed or implied, prior to November 12, 1918, by any officer or agent acting under his authority.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation by reason of producing or preparing to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrite, or tungsten.

It is not my intention that other than bona fide claimants should be considered. I do not ask that an appropriation be made. Justice to men—the prospector and mine operator—is all I ask.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be notified when I have used five minutes.

Now, gentlemen, what is the situation with which we are confronted when we are asked to enact this bill? We recall that on March 2, 1919, this matter of paying compensation to producers of certain more or less rare minerals for their losses was brought before us. It was represented to Congress that a great many persons, firms, and corporations, acting under the stimulation of the requests and demands of the different activities of the Government, had invested in certain mining enterprises, to mine manganese and chrome and pyrites and tungsten and minerals of that sort, and that by reason of the sudden ending of the war had suffered heavy losses. Now, after considerable contest as to the wording of the law, Congress finally adopted language which, I think, was very broad and comprehensive and sufficient to allow any just claim to be adjudicated. Let me read what the law says as to the kind of claims which may be allowed. I read a part of section 5 of the original law, which says:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to adjust, liquidate, and pay such net losses as have been suffered by any person, firm, or corporation by reason of producing or preparing to produce manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten in compliance with the request or demand of the Department of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

By this language Members will see that we provided that the Secretary of the Interior might favorably consider any claim for losses resulting from expenditures for these purposes, which expenditures were based either upon a request or demand of either one of these several agencies of the Federal Government. Following the passage of the law the Secretary of the Interior appointed a commission to hear and adjudicate these claims. The commission was composed, as I recollect, of our former honored colleague, now deceased, Dr. Foster, of Senator Shafroth, of Colorado, and, I believe, a gentleman by the name of Moore. Now, before that commission, if I recall correctly, something over 1,200 claims were filed. After considering and hearing the evidence in these claims, 610 of them were rejected and the balance allowed for varying amounts. And now it is proposed by this bill to permit all of these 610 disallowed claims to be reopened and again considered and, if allowed, to be paid.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] in his opening speech says that it is only intended by the Secretary of the Interior to open up such claims as those in which there has been a miscalculation of facts and figures. If that were the only purpose of the bill, I would see no harm in it and would not oppose it, but let me call your attention to the language. It is plain and easily understood by anyone. Let us see the class of claims which will be reopened under this bill. It says:

If in claims passed under said act awards have been denied—

That would cover 610 cases—

or made under rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts, which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act.

The language is broad enough, and the intention of it is to open up every conceivable claim upon which there has been an adverse finding. Now, suppose we set this precedent. It would be well that we should consider how far-reaching might be its effect. We authorized the Secretary of War some time ago to settle certain claims in cases where all the formalities of the law had not been complied with in making the contracts for war supplies. The Secretary of War has adjudicated a very large number of these claims, and has only allowed a certain portion of such claims and has rejected many, either in whole or in part.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I will use five minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman does not object, I make the point of no quorum at this time. It seems to me more Members ought to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLACK. I do not care to have the point of no quorum made now, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think they should hear the remarks of the gentleman. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] No quorum is present. The Clerk will call the roll.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WALSH] having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 843) to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Clerk to call the roll, whereupon 261 Members had answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted a list of the absentees for entry in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have used one minute of the second five minutes which I started out to use when the point of no quorum was made. I ask to be notified when I have spoken four minutes, so as to make five minutes in all.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. BLACK. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us review what the real purpose of this bill is. As I stated a short time ago, before the point of no quorum was made, under the original bill all claimants were permitted to file claims where they could establish that the mining work which they started or concluded was upon the request or the demand of either the Secretary of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the United States Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Under that bill, which was very broad in its terms, more than twelve hundred claims were filed, and about half of them allowed and 610 disallowed. The original amount appropriated was $8,500,000.

There is a considerable amount of that money unexpended, which will be turned back into the Treasury, unless we open up the wide door which the present bill seeks. If we pass this bill, what kind of a door do we open? Let the bill speak for itself. If we pass it, here are the kind of claims which may then be allowed:

Provided, That all claimants who, in response to any personal, written, or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal from any of the Government agencies mentioned in said act—

All of these kind of claims may be reopened under this amended law; and some of the Members in this debate, in illustration of the class of language upon which they expect to rely as a basis for claims, have read certain circulars sent out by the Department of the Interior in which the Secretary stated in such general language as "that it was desirable to develop our resources and make use of our mineral wealth to win the war." Well, of course, advertisements and interviews and appeals of that kind were made everywhere. It was proper that they should be made. But are we to allow the use of these as a basis of claims against the United States?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman believe that this would include even claimants who had never communicated with any of these agencies, who had never advised the Government in any way that they intended to produce or attempt to produce minerals and who went on on their own account and initiative, taking a chance, to produce these minerals, so that now the Government has no record whatever of their having attempted to do anything in the interest of the prosecution of the war?

Mr. BLACK. Yes. Not only would it allow it to be done but that is the purpose of the language in the bill, if I understood it aright, to include just such cases as that. And if we set this precedent it will mean that those war contractors who have filed their contracts with the War Department and have had their claims disallowed, either in whole or in part, will be coming to Congress, asking that their cases be reopened.

Why, not long ago I had a prominent oil-mill man who lives in my district come to my office and say, "We have not been dealt with fairly in the settlement for our cotton linters." I told him that it was my understanding that the settlement was made by agreement by the War Department and representatives of the cotton-oil industry, and that so far as I was concerned I favored that the settlement should stand. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allotted to himself by the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield to me now?

Mr. BLACK. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, an attempt is being made by the Committee on Mines and Mining by this bill to authorize the consideration of claims which the House by a positive vote rejected when this original proposition was under consideration nearly three years ago, and I wish to submit to the Members of the House whether they now, three years after we passed the act authorizing the adjudication of these claims, wish to broaden it so as to consider every claim of every mining prospector who may be able to show that he was influenced by some newspaper advertisement.

Attorney General Palmer—and I direct your attention to his opinion in his letter of July 1, 1919, counter to the opinion of the present Secretary of the Interior, if the latter's letter bears that construction—when asked by the then Secretary of the Interior, the Hon. Franklin K. Lane, what "request or demand" in the present law means in response to his request for a construction of those words, wherein he uses this language:

The words "request" and "demand" are both synonyms of the word "ask."

That is, one of the five governmental agencies, namely, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation, or the Department of the Interior, must have asked, either by request or demand, the claimant to produce or prepare to produce one of the four named minerals—ferromanganese, tungsten, pyrites, or chrome.

Further on he goes on to say:

The language used could hardly be more clear or allow less room for construction. No claim based upon a general appeal—

And that is the purpose of the provision now before the committee. Claims totaling in all $18,000,000 have been filed before this War Minerals Relief Commission—

No claim based upon a general appeal or solicitation is authorized by it, but to come under the statute the claimant must have been asked specifically by either the Department of the Interior, the War Industries Board, the War Trade Board, the Shipping Board, or the Emergency Fleet Corporation to produce one or more of the named minerals.

In your inquiry you state:

Many claims have been filed which appear to be based upon an asserted reliance upon appeals to the general public for the production of those minerals alleged to have appeared in the newspapers, etc.

As I have stated above, the statute does not authorize the recognition of a claim based upon a general solicitation or appeal. This is apparent from the provision itself. It is also apparent from the history of the enactment—which it is unnecessary to detail here—that it was intentionally framed so as to exclude such claims as referred to by you.

(Signed) A. MITCHELL PALMER,
Attorney General.

Let me recall to the attention of the committee briefly the history of this bill. When the original bill passed the House it authorized the Secretary of War to adjudicate and compromise claims where the Government had entered into contracts for the production of munitions, materials, and what not, to aid in winning the war and which had ben canceled by the Government after the armistice. The bill went over to the Senate. It came back with section 5 so broad in its phraseology that the chairman of the conference committee opposed it. Twice it was rejected because of its broad phraseology; because of general language which would cover claims just such as are proposed to be covered by this bill.

Now, I wish to call to your attention the language of Mr. Dent, chairman of the committee, and later to the language of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], both conferees on this bill, on the phraseology in which it was framed when it first came back to the House. Mr. Dent, chairman of the House conferees, used this language:

According to the construction that we placed upon it and which it is possible to place upon it, every person in the country who happened to own a piece of land with an undeveloped mineral deposit upon it, upon reading the statement of the Secretary of the Interior in the newspapers that he should develop these particular ores needed for war purposes and who went to work to do it, would have a claim against the Government. Why, the language of section 5 of the Senate bill may be so construed as to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to recognize any moral obligation that he sees fit.

That is Chairman Dent's language. Now, here is Representative FIELDS's language——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. One of the conferees?

Mr. STAFFORD. One of the conferees. He said:

I am not in favor of recognizing the claim of every man who says that he enlarged his operations because he read an advertisement in the newspapers that the Government wanted him to do so.

The House overwhelmingly rejected the conference report in February, 1919, and sent the bill back to conference. It came back again.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield me more time.

Mr. RHODES. I can not yield time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I can not yield until I conclude my statement. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining. If he will yield time to me, I will yield to him for all the questions he wishes to ask.

The conference report was rejected. Why? Because of its broad phraseology. It came back again, and we rejected it a second time because of its broad phraseology. Then an agreement was reached, the phraseology was changed and put into its present form, and though it was contested by many eminent leaders on this floor—men like Mr. LEVER, Mr. MANN, and others—it was adopted; but it bore the limited phraseology in which it is stated to-day.

It is proposed at this late day, nearly three years after, to open the Treasury of the United States to afford relief to every person who happened to engage in the development of mining for certain minerals—namely, manganese, chrome, and two other minerals. If we pass this bill in its present form every farmer, every manufacturer, every person who was appealed to by the President or any Cabinet officer to work to his utmost to develop his industry to provide for winning the war would have a claim if he enlarged his plant, if he extended his area of cultivation before the date of the armistice on November 11, 1918, and suffered a loss by reason of that investment predicated upon the war continuing. They would have a more righteous claim than these mine operators who are coming here seeking protection in the pending tariff bill, because these owners of ferromanganese mines and these other minerals for the first time in the history of this country have succeeded in securing the passage through this House of a tariff rate on ferromanganese more than 100 per cent higher than was ever carried by any previous tariff act, namely, $40 a ton, when the rate in the Underwood bill is only $4 a ton, in the Payne Act only $4.50 or $5, and in the Dingley Act $6 a ton. Here they are wanting to have the Government compensate them for their investment made in the closing days of the war, because this act of October 8, 1918, which we passed to conserve those special industries, as the Solicitor of the Interior Department says, never was operative because the armistice came within a month afterwards. We are called upon to compensate these men for their investment that they made from the time of the starting of the war in April, 1917, until November, 1918, when the Government did not ask them to develop their mines until just at the close of the war, a few months before. All their investment made any time since the war started, and which proved unsuccessful because the war ended, is to be compensated, whether asked by the Government or not.

Oh, gentlemen say that only $3,000,000 have been expended up to date out of the $8,500,000 appropriated. Is it the purpose, because we have appropriated too much and find that there are only $3,000,000 of valid claims under the original authorization, that we should now open the door to these specious claims that have no merit whatsoever? It was a business venture entirely. These large manufacturers kept on investing their profits in war industry in anticipation that the war would continue another year or another two years. They were caught by the cessation of the war. The farmer who bought implements in anticipation of the continuation of war, and who bought land at four or five times its value and was caught by the armistice, suffered a loss but he got nothing; but these mine owners will get under this proposed bill a return of their investment. Gentlemen, such a policy can not be defended. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RHODES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON], a member of the committee.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am very certain that the gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. STAFFORD] is laboring entirely under a misapprehension as to the provisions of this measure. The facts are that not one single claim that has not already been filed could be filed hereafter and considered. This talk of opening the floodgates and allowing all kinds of claims to be brought in is based entirely upon an erroneous understanding of the facts. All the claims that could possibly be considered have already been filed. Some of them have been rejected upon the merest technicalities. It is admitted, and gentlemen who have spoken here have not denied it, that there were a number of legitimate claims that were actually placed in the mails a number of days prior to the time for the filing of claims had expired, but because they did not arrive before 12 o'clock on June 2, 1919, they were shut out. In other words, claims mailed, for instance, from the State of Colorado reached here in time, but equally meritorious claims mailed from Oregon and California did not. The California claims are shut out and the Colorado claims are allowed. Is that fair? Every man who has spoken here has admitted that it is not. One of the provisions of this bill is to cover those cases. This is simply a bill providing for the consideration of claims that have already been filed, and it does not open the door to any claims that are not now before the Interior Department.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. I want to make one other statement first. There are others who desire to speak. My colleague [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] from Colorado particularly wanted to speak, but he yielded, and insisted that a member of the committee occupy the time. He has a large number of claimants who worked hard to produce tungsten and other minerals, but have not had their claims properly considered on account, in many cases, of a technicality. This bill is designed to remedy that. Now, gentlemen have talked about opening the door so widely. The Secretary of the Interior does not hesitate to say that had he been construing the law, in the first place, he would have considered many of the claims which have been shut out, and in order that there will be no question about his authority to do so now he simply asks that he be given, in plain and unmistakable language, the right to review the cases.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLTON. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. I have so much confidence in the good judgment of the gentleman that I want to ask him a question. Will this include any class of claims not included in the original act?

Mr. COLTON. Yes; in this way. If, in response to a printed invitation or request by proper Government agencies, they went out and endeavored to produce the ores, it will include them, whereas a strict construction of the existing statute shut them out. The former Secretary held that there must have been a personal solicitation. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Where does it leave a man who had not filed his claim?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLTON. I am sorry time will not permit me to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is not one of the 1,200 claims that have been filed under this act that can not be allowed under the provisions of this bill if it passes. Any one of the 610 that have not been allowed can be allowed, and the 600 that have been allowed can be reviewed, and there is a total liability of $12,000,000 in this bill.

Secretary Fall asked the committee to do two things, if it did anything. I have not time to read the whole letter contained in the report; but he refers to two things: First, where the claims were filed and not received prior to the date of the limitation; and, second, that any claims that have been miscalculated ought to be reviewed. He asked for the correction of these two things, and in express language in this letter says that if these two things are done that is all that is necessary. And yet the committee has gone further and inserted this language as pointed out by many Members. They have inserted these words "personal, written, or published" before the word "request." So that it did not need to be an express request or demand for any Government official; if it was published in any newspaper, in any call to the people to go out and help win the war, that was a sufficient "appeal" to justify the filing of a claim under the provisions of this act. They have added to the words "request or demand," "solicitation and appeal," so they make it as broad as the universe itself. Anybody who spent any money at any time in attempting to do any mining or any mine promoting can come in under this bill and claim for losses sustained.

Now, the original act said "produce or preparing to produce," and they have added the language "in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce" any of the ores or minerals. They have made it read, "in good faith in spending any money in preparing," so that they have added an additional element as broad as language could make it. Anybody who bought stock in one of these enterprises, even though it may have been a wildcat enterprise, and lost out can come in and file a claim.

On the last page, in the last paragraph, it provides:

> If in claims passed upon under said act awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts, which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act.

I wish I had more time to call attention to the original act. We put proviso after proviso into it making certain limitations on the right to recover. Here are two of them:

> And provided further, That no claim shall be allowed or paid by said Secretary unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said Secretary that the expenditures so made or obligations so incurred by the claimant were made in good faith for or upon property which contained either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten in sufficient quantities to be of commercial importance: And provided further, That no claims shall be paid unless it shall appear to the satisfaction of said Secretary that moneys were invested or obligations were incurred subsequent to April 6, 1917, and prior to November 12, 1918, in a legitimate attempt to produce either manganese, chrome, pyrites, or tungsten for the needs of the Nation for the prosecution of the war, and that no profits of any kind shall be included in the allowance of any of said claims, and that no investment for merely speculative purposes shall be recognized in any manner by said Secretary.

We thrashed that all out and put in the provisos. This being subsequent legislation repeals by implication the conflicting provisos and leaves the law wide open without a single safety clause. Read the original act and you will see that if this does not repeal these provisos there is at least most serious doubt about it. If so, every claimant can come in, and the blue sky is the limit. If the $12,000,000 is the total I shall be surprised.

Now, if the claim is once filed within the period of limitations, do you know any reason why it can not be amended so as to state other claims which the claimant may have. This bill ought not to be passed in its present form. Members on our side should remember that this is not Democratic legislation. This is our bill, and while we Republicans may have voted in the past for some acts perhaps that were forced upon us by the last administration under the whip and spur of the war emergency we can not make that excuse now if we pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, during the Sixty-sixth Congress I was a member of the Committee on Mines and Mining. This question came before that committee, and after many weeks of careful hearing the committee at that time decided that they would not attempt in any way to enlarge the provisions of existing law but to report, and did report, a bill which would give to the dissatisfied claimants under section 5 the right to appeal to the Court of Claims and to the Supreme Court, allowing them also the right of a trial de novo in the Court of Claims. That bill went on the calendar, but was never passed. The Committee on Mines and Mining at that time in its report made use of these words:

> The language of the act as above quoted is clear, and if interpreted as the courts of the country have repeatedly held the statutes should be interpreted, the committee is of the opinion that the purpose of Congress can be fully carried out and a just and equitable settlement can be had of every legitimate claim.

I believe that the committee at that time reflected the sentiment of Congress and reflected the sentiment of the American people to the effect that the law as originally written, if given its just and equitable interpretation, would satisfy every legitimate claim in the United States. I believe that is true to-day and that it would be a serious mistake if this House at this time should enlarge the provisions of the original act, and if instead of making it a request or a demand coming from the particular departments named allow advertisement or any other different form as specified in the amendment to prevail, we will open up a great flood of claims, and many people who have never thought of filing claims will come forward now and file their claims, and the American people will have to pay them.

The original act is broad enough, and if you extend it so as to include every other kind of claims you are going to set a dangerous precedent. Thousands of farmers of the West and the South planted more wheat and more foodstuffs under the demand and request of the Government, and thousands of people on the plains bought cattle during July and August, 1918, because the American Government was demanding that they as patriotic citizens do their part in helping to win the war by producing fats. The armistice was signed in November, 1918, before they had marketed their cattle which they had purchased, and the cattlemen and farmers throughout the entire Nation have suffered a loss that it would take millions and millions of dollars to pay. Are you going to make fish of one and fowl of another? Are you going to say to one class that you will pay their claims and to the other that you will deny theirs? It is a question of equity between man and man, and if you expand this law and make it as broad as this bill does, then you will invite every other man from the plains of the West and the South, from the East and the North, anywhere in the United States, to file a claim before the Congress, and they will be just as much entitled to relief as some of these men will be who come in under the enlarged provisions of this bill. Do not misunderstand me. The second section of the original act gives the right of appeal to the Court of Claims for all claims arising under section 1, and I feel that the same right should be granted claimants under this section, and I would support such a law.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, one can not begin to touch this big subject in 10 minutes, let alone an hour. I may be able to answer a few of the aspersions that have been cast on this bill. We have heard to-day, as we have heard before, reference to the "big war contractors." Who are the big war contractors that are covered under this bill? They are a lot of men in Oregon, California, and a few other States who went out and undertook to develop chrome for Government purposes. The development of chrome is not in normal times a profitable industry in the United States. In 1913 we produced only about 300 tons of chrome. In 1918, due to the stimulation and the activity and the solemn promises of this Government made to a lot of men who were not really miners, our domestic production increased from 300 tons to 65,000 tons, and we thereby released from three to four hundred thousand tons of shipping to carry our soldiers and our war material abroad. Who are these big producers? There are about 225 of these claimants whose claims are less than $1,000 each. There are about 370 of them whose claims are under $2,000 each; about 431 whose claims are under $3,000 each; and about 500 whose claims are under $5,000 each. Where is your big war contractor that you have dragged in here?

Why did these men go to work to produce this chrome? They did it because they were told by the Shipping Board that they would be rewarded and recompensed if they would go out into the hills and produce this chrome and thereby release shipping and give us more ships. They were not only told that, but a bill was pending in Congress at the time, which later passed, providing for a tariff, providing for an embargo, providing for a fixing of prices on these metals. That price fixing was to last until two years after the termination of the war. Not only that, but they were given an embargo upon this chrome, so that they could sell to the Government or sell in industry the chrome which, if they did not produce, we would have to send our ships to Australia, Africa, and New Caledonia to get this chrome. An embargo was put on the chrome to help recompense the producers, but that embargo was surreptitiously lifted. It was surreptitiously lifted by the representatives of the big industries that desired to have cheap chrome; and who were they? Who were upon this Government board in charge of chrome production and market for the War Industries Board? There was J. A. Farrell, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation; Mr. E. F. Price, of the Electro Metallurgical Co.; and a half dozen others, including C. A. Buck, of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, the names ending with that of D. G. Kerr, of the Carnegie Steel Co. These men lifted the embargo; they violated the agreement that they had with the chrome producers; and that is testified to by Mr. Philip N. Moore, of the War Relief Mineral Commission. On page 417 of the hearing on H. J. Res. 170, Sixty-sixth Congress, February 7, 1920, he testified:

> A large number of these claims for losses in the production of chrome would never have been made if the various boards dealing with shipping had stood by the agreement of the Shipping Board.

The Shipping Board ordered an embargo on ships for this purpose. The ship allotment board, for one reason or another—the ship allotment committee of the Shipping Board, for one reason or another—satisfactory to themselves permitted large importations of foreign chrome. Mr. Chairman, the large importation of foreign chrome was permitted by the chairman of the Steel Trust, was permitted by the head of the Carnegie Steel Co., and the price of chrome fell, and a number of these men became absolutely bankrupt. The war minerals act was advertised by the Shipping Board throughout the country as an encouragement to these men to go out and produce chrome. Here in my hand is a Government publication published in the Engineering and Mining Journal over the name of the head of the "War minerals committee," William Young Westervelt, on January 19, 1918, indicating to the producers that if they would go out and dig up this unprofitable mineral they would be taken care of by the Government—by Uncle Sam.

Now, we do not want Uncle Sam to renege. Uncle Sam will not repudicate his obligations. Uncle Sam will stay by his bargains made with these men. Why is it necessary to amend this law? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] speaks of the general modification of the law. Every safeguard in the original act is retained if this bill passes. We merely amend the paragraph and leave every line of the original act except that we say that if they did this work in accordance with a written or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal of certain Government agencies then they will be recompensed this net loss. For what? Only for their net loss, and not a cent more.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. For a brief question. My time is very brief.

Mr. UPSHAW. When a member of the Cabinet like Secretary Fall, after surveying the situation, asks for this bill in order that we may correct flagrant abuses, and a committee of this House, after a faithful hearing for several weeks, indorses the request to do simple justice, does not the gentleman think it is a safe basis for action?

Mr. SINNOTT. I certainly do, and not only did Secretary Fall suggest it but Secretary Lane himself in these hearings last Congress suggested a more liberal interpretation of this act.

Now, the original act, as the gentleman from Texas said, would have been sufficient had it not been for the restrictive interpretation and construction placed upon it by the Attorney General and by the Solicitor General, who said the request must have been a personal, specific request directed to the chrome producer. They asked the director of the Oregon Bureau of Mines to help in this development. He went out among the miners, and he said, "Mr. Nelson, you get out this ore," then Mr. Nelson would be paid.

If this gentleman sitting at the right happened to hear about the necessity of getting out that ore, why, he would not be paid. The man that was patriotic and industrious and got out the ore upon the published request of the Government is not paid, but the laggard and the sluggard and the slacker, who had to be stimulated and prodded by a personal visit from the Department of the Interior, is to be rewarded. Are you going to penalize the patriot and succor the slacker who would not get out this ore to save our ships until he was personally prodded into activity by some agent from the department? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 843) to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

Add to the first paragraph of section 5 the following proviso: "Provided, That all claimants who, in response to any personal, written, or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal from any of the Government agencies mentioned in said act, in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce any of the ores or minerals named therein and have heretofore filed their claims within the time and in the manner prescribed by said act, if the proof already filed in support of said claims clearly shows them to be based upon action taken in response to such request, demand, solicitation, or appeal shall be reimbursed such net losses as they may have been found to have incurred and are in justice and equity entitled to from the appropriation in said act, and that the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act be continued available for the purpose named above until all such claims shall be finally settled or disposed of."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, line 3, page 1, down to and including line 13, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled 'An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes,' be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"'Add to the first paragraph of section 5 the following proviso: "Provided, That all claimants who, in response to any personal, written, or published request, demand, solicitation, or appeal from any of the Government agencies mentioned in said act, in good faith expended money in producing or preparing to produce any of the ores or minerals named therein and have heretofore mailed or filed their claims within the time and in the manner prescribed by said act, if the proof in support of said claims clearly shows them to be based upon action taken in response to such request, demand, solicitation, or appeal, shall be reimbursed such net losses as they may have incurred and are in justice and equity entitled to from the appropriation in said act."

"'If in claims passed upon under said act awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts, which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act.'"

Mr. RAKER, Mr. STEVENSON, and Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment under consideration is not in order, for the reason that the Committee on Mines and Mining has no jurisdiction over appropriations, nor has it jurisdiction over war claims. But I make my main objection to the fact that the amendment reported by the committee is virtually an appropriation, making available money that has heretofore been appropriated to pay claims which under existing law are not authorized. I direct the chairman's attention to the special wording as found in the last paragraph of the proposed House amendment:

If in claims passed upon under said act awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts, which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act.

What do we have before us? That phraseology that I have just read is tantamount to an appropriation. In the original act, of which this act is amendatory, $8,500,000 was made available for the payment of claims of certain kinds under certain conditions. Now it is proposed to broaden the class of claimants which may avail themselves of the money that was appropriated under that act. Why, by making the act amendatory of the original act you do not overcome the objection to the rule that the Committee on Mines and Mining has no jurisdiction to report bills carrying appropriations. Suppose the Committee on Mines and Mining, instead of offering this bill as a proviso to the original act, had offered an original bill, saying that these claims, of a different character than covered heretofore, of a different character entirely, not covered in the original intendment of the law, shall be passed upon by this War Minerals Relief Commission and so much money appropriated for the payment of those claims. The Chair would immediately have to rule that the Committee on Mines and Mining had no jurisdiction to report such a bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow an inquiry?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. This appropriation has already been made and is unexpended. Would the application of the same law running to the payment for the same purposes have to be through another committee?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is well established, even in connection with general appropriation bills, that you can not, by saying money available for another purpose—another purpose, remember—and which has been appropriated, that an unexpended balance that has not been used for one purpose can be used for another purpose which is not authorized by existing law. That is what this bill does.

The proponents of the bill claim this is a provision to bring in claimants that have not had their claims passed upon under existing law. They make available certain money. If this law is not passed the money not expended would naturally be turned back into the Treasury. This appropriates that balance, makes it available for new uses. The bill seeks to recognize claimants that are to-day not recognized and to make available money that has heretofore been appropriated. That money is in the Treasury. The fundamental principle of that rule, to make all appropriations come from the appropriating committee, was to safeguard the Treasury. Here is an instance where they are trying to evade the rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Is the gentleman basing his position on section 5 of Rule XXI as originally adopted by the House?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I call attention to the language of that provision, which says that no bill or joint resolution carrying appropriation, and so forth, shall be in order. Is it the gentleman's position that this bill carries an appropriation?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; it carries an appropriation. It makes available money that otherwise would not be available. It indirectly carries an appropriation. Why, this bill would not be operative, there would be no money available if it were not for the phraseology of this bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas rose.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard in opposition to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who desires to ask me a question.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If this money is already appropriated for this purpose, what is the occasion for this bill? What is the occasion, if this $8,000,000 which is in the Treasury, as the chairman states, is already available?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Texas states the question concisely. If the money is available for the payment of these claims, what is the use of this bill? If it is not available it is necessary to make it available.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin familiar with the statute stating and determining what is an appropriation?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not familiar with it.

Mr. SINNOTT. I am familiar with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not affect the policy or the purpose of the rule which we adopted declaring that no committee other than the Committee on Appropriations shall report bills carrying an appropriation. And that is what this bill does.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect for the views expressed by my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], while he has made some very violent and extravagant statements here in the course of this debate, he has overshot the mark more in his last argument than in any other.

I want to call the gentleman's attention to the language that is set forth on page 3 of the original act. In the second paragraph on page 3 he will find these words, in connection with the administration of the law by the Secretary of the Interior. I hope I may have the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has my entire attention.

Mr. RHODES. Thank you. I read:

And that said funds and appropriations shall continue to be available for said purpose until such time as the Secretary shall have exercised the authority herein granted and performed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. RHODES. I will not at this time, if the gentleman will indulge me that privilege.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. RHODES. Thank you. The gentleman is very considerate. It is clear, Mr. Chairman, that the Secretary of the Interior has the right to continue to expend whatever sum of the original $8,500,000 appropriated that is now on hand in winding up the affairs of the commission. This bill does not permit the Secretary to expend money from any source except that which has already been appropriated. In fact, Mr. Chairman, this is the very spirit and reason of the amendment, and I will say that I am violating no confidence when I call the attention of this committee to the fact that we discussed it personally with the Secretary of the Interior, and it was his opinion that the language in the Senate bill providing for a reappropriation was unnecessary, because in the original act the money is to be available until such time as the Secretary may have wound up the adjudication of these claims.

Why, the gentleman from Wisconsin went so far as to say that it would open the door of opportunity and permit consideration of claims that had never been presented or considered up to this time. There is not one word of truth in that statement. In fact, that statement is as far from the truth as the statement that the gentleman made in regard to the effort of the Committee on Mines and Mining was seeking to make an appropriation.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this legislation is necessary in order to constitute this act a well-balanced piece of legislation. It does not undertake to bring in one additional claimant who is not already before the Secretary of the Interior, and it calls for no additional appropriation, because no additional appropriation is necessary. I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is the gentleman willing to have stricken out of the bill, in lines 10 and 11 of page 3, which reads as follows:

which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act?

Is the gentleman unwilling to have those words stricken out?

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman is unwilling to have any words in the bill stricken out, because the Secretary of the Interior knows the weakness of the present law, and he is in a better position to pass upon the administrative features of the law than either the gentleman from Illinois or myself.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, I claim no infallibility.

Mr. RHODES. It is not a question of infallibility, but of fact.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is not the gentleman afraid that if these words are stricken out the Secretary of the Interior will not certify the new claims?

Mr. RHODES. It is necessary to make the language in the act clear and intelligible. Mr. Chairman, the funds are available and are already appropriated.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I just want to call the attention of the Chair to a feature of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. On the point of order?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; on the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, there has been prepared and printed a document containing these claims, consisting of 1,207. The comptroller has refused to pay some of these claims because the Secretary of the Interior awarded the claims and then sent back amended awards. The comptroller holds that having passed on the claims in the first instance, although a clerical error had been made, the comptroller under the law could not pay the claims as amended. One of the purposes of this bill is to correct the legal opinion of the Comptroller of the Treasury to the end that the amended award made by the Secretary of the Interior may be allowed and paid in due course. The second purpose of the bill is to pay a few of these claims that were not actually filed in the office at a certain hour, but were in the mail at that time and received in the office a few hours after the limitation had expired as provided in the law. These claims are to be paid out of this same appropriation, which is made continuous and not exhausted until the Secretary has disposed of all of them. That is as it should be.

There is another class of claims in the report, and part of the same claims which have already been filed. No other claim can be allowed except from these 1,207 reported by the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary with his commission, consisting of Senator Shafroth, Dr. Foster—only part of the time—and Mr. Moore, rendered an opinion that these must be personal demands and requests. The then Secretary followed that conclusion of the commission, based upon the opinion of the Attorney General. I call attention to the language of Secretary Fall, the present Secretary of the Interior, in the first sentence of his letter to the chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining. It reads as follows:

> Senate bill 843 merely amends the act of March 2, 1919, relative to war minerals relief in relation to the character of request or demand; that is to say, stimulation. It broadens the scope of stimulation along the line which, I may say, I should have followed had I passed upon the cases already decided as an original proposition.
> Second—
> In reviewing these cases I have power, in my judgment, to reach the end provided in this bill without additional legislative authority.

But under the comptroller's decision, of which I have a copy here in this report, which decision was rendered on November 6, 1920, the comptroller held that should the Secretary of the Interior now interpret that statute as everyone believes it ought to be interpreted, and render a proper decision upon those mining claims which are here, which were rejected upon the sole ground that there was no personal request, the comptroller would hold that those claims could not be paid out of this $8,500,000 balance now in the Treasury on the ground that the Secretary has exhausted his power.

The Secretary of the Interior asks Congress to do justice to these mineral claimants; not to reappropriate any money, not to pass any addition to the law, but to rectify an opinion that has been rendered and which is final until it has been reversed by the comptroller, which it will not be, or amended by statutory provisions by Congress, to the end that these claims may be adjusted and paid out of this same appropriation. This bill simply makes a direction to the comptroller, not as an appropriation, not as an authorization to use money out of appropriations that may hereafter be made, but simply a direction to the comptroller that notwithstanding his former opinion it is the direction of Congress that he was wrong in his opinion and that these claims when and as finally adjusted by the Secretary of the Interior should be allowed and paid by him.

So therefore it is wholly clear and consistent that this can not be an appropriation. It is not a continuation of appropriations, because the original law provides that this appropriation shall be a continuing one. The bill is simply to correct these imperfections, to the end that these claims may finally once and for all be properly and justly settled.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order, unless the Chair is ready to rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it will be admitted that the Committee on Mines and Mining might authorize an appropriation to be made, and it seems to me that the question here is whether this is an authorization of an appropriation or an actual appropriation. If the conclusion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is to be followed to its logical end, the conclusion he must reach is that no committee of the House has authority to report any bill the effect of which is to make necessary in the future an increased appropriation or to make necessary an increase of expenditures out of appropriation already made. We are constantly passing such bills. It is true we have not put into them specific authorization to use appropriations already made for the purpose of carrying out the additional things involved in amendments to existing law. It was not necessary to do that, because the amendment of the act itself is an authorization for the use of funds for that purpose.

Now, this bill makes no appropriation. The appropriation has already been made. This is an authorization for an appropriation, and if there were no appropriation to cover it, the Appropriations Committee would be in duty bound to make an appropriation under this authorization for the purpose which Congress has established by the act itself.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Referring to the last paragraph on page 3, supposing the bill under consideration to have become a law, would the Secretary of the Interior be authorized to issue warrants or would the Treasury Department be authorized to pay the amounts found due under these claims without a further appropriation?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know that I can answer that question definitely, because it is a technical question that is difficult to answer; but it seems to me it is a direction to the Secretary, and not an appropriation. In other words, it is a question, from the comptroller's point of view, as to whether the Secretary of the Interior has been authorized by Congress to do a certain thing.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. If under the terms of the paragraph referred to payment is authorized, then this bill, if enacted into law, becomes effective as the transfer of money from the United States Treasury to some individual. Is not that correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. This bill authorizes a payment out of an appropriation already made. Now, this is not a question of law. This is a question of the rules of the House which the gentleman has raised, and the question here is not a question of the interpretation of this law. It is a question of the interpretation of the rules of the House. That question is, Is this an appropriation which this committee is not authorized to make? It seems to me it is not such an appropriation, because the appropriation has already been made for the purposes specified in the act.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is not the test really whether this bill increases the amount of money appropriated by the Congress?

Mr. ANDERSON. It seems so to me, if the gentleman uses the word "appropriation" in the sense that I use it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. A certain class of claims were authorized to be paid under the present law. The amount of money appropriated is the amount necessary to pay those claims out of the eight and a half million dollars.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me call attention to the fact that this particular paragraph against which the point of order is made does not authorize any claim to be paid that could not have been paid before, because if the Secretary of the Interior had properly calculated the amount due under the original act he could have paid the money without additional legislation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But this bill goes far beyond that; it raises a new class of claims.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it does.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It permits claims to be adjudicated which could not under the present law be adjudicated.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it does.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then why are you here?

Mr. ANDERSON. Not because the claims could not be adjudicated but because the claimants did not file their claims in time.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is only as to a few of them. There were over 600 that were filed in proper time and rejected by the Secretary of the Interior because, as he says, they did not come within the provisions of the existing law.

Mr. ANDERSON. In those cases the rulings made and the interpretations made were wrong.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The present Secretary of the Interior says that his predecessor was wrong, but the present Secretary of the Interior allows those rulings to stand.

Mr. ANDERSON. All of which has nothing to do with the point of order.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order is based on an erroneous statement of facts. I know the gentleman did not intentionally make a misstatement, but he was misled when he says there are classes to be put in the bill not in the present law. He cited these words, "or preparing to produce." Section 5, existing law, carried that identical language. If the point of order had been made against the last provision in the Senate bill, which the Chair will find on page 2, I would not contend against the point of order, but that is a different proposition—> and that the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act be continued available for the purpose named above until all such claims shall be finally settled or disposed of.

In other words, they sought to change existing law. To-day there is an appropriation still in existence, an unexpended balance, and it is not sought by this amendment to enlarge the unexpended balance. It is not sought to use it for a different purpose than that for which it was appropriated. It is quite different from a case where you have an item in existing law, say, in a current appropriation bill authorizing the Quartermaster General of the Army to buy so many automobiles and you sought to authorize him out of that item to buy so many dozen typewriters. That would be a different proposition entirely.

The question involved by this bill is one of interpretation. It is not authorizing a new claim; it is specifically limiting it to adjudication of claims already filed under existing law and providing for their correct adjudication. Every one of the adjudicated claims under this act will be paid out of the identical appropriation covered by the original act for the identical purpose and for the identical class of original claims that Congress passed on, and on the same claims that were authorized. In other words, we say to the Secretary of the Interior that he can pass on claims authorized by existing law. For illustration, he could take the claim of the man in California, the Dolbear claim, where they admitted that it was a mere adding-machine mistake. The comptroller held that they could not correct their own mistake, although it was purely an adding-machine mistake. That was a strained construction, because the commission originally was not given the right to review, but Congress reserved to itself the right to review. We are now seeking to exercise the right of review provided in the original act, and we are laying down the method by which in detail the agency of this Congress shall have the right to review its own quasi judicial acts. We under the original law had the right to do this and reserved the right to do it, providing for a review.

If we have a right to review it in the first instance, then we could provide the agencies to review it, and we are acting under the original law, and the point of order could not have been made on the expenditure that we might authorize for review by a special committee of the House without letting it go to the Committee on Accounts, because the original act provides for that, and we are operating under the original act. We are seeking by legislative declaration to correct an erroneous interpretation of what the original legislative intent was. That is all the bill does, and that is the object of it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion lines 9, 10, and 11 merely designate the fund out of which the payments are to be made in case this act passes. If we must have a new appropriation in order to pay these claimants mentioned in this act, then this act is practically nugatory and vain, because it does not provide for an appropriation.

I call to the attention of the Chair the act of June 30, 1906, Thirty-fourth Statutes, 764, in Barnes' Federal Code, section 6039:

> Specific appropriations required: No act of Congress hereafter passed shall be construed to make an appropriation out of the Treasury of the United States, or to authorize the execution of a contract involving the payment of money in excess of appropriations made by law, unless such act shall in specific terms declare an appropriation to be made or that a contract may be executed.

This act does not declare in those specific terms or any terms that an appropriation shall be made. It merely designates an appropriation already made as the fund from which the payment is to be made.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, in great deference to the parliamentarians who have preceded me, I should like to be heard for a moment, especially in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas. He concedes that lines 10, 11, and 12 of the Senate bill, page 2, would be subject to a point of order; that that would be an appropriation; that merely continues in effect the appropriation which had already been made until these claims are finally disposed of. The language in lines 9, 10, and 11 of page 3 there is exactly the same thing. It is said there that these amounts shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act. That does not say in exact words that it shall be continued in effect until the claims are paid, but it says absolutely that it shall be paid from them, and therefore it must mean that the appropriation is continued in effect, so that one is the same as the other.

But I want to direct the attention of the Chair to what I consider the basis of this controversy. When this act was originally passed it was provided that certain claims arising out of transactions had in compliance with the request or demand of the Department of the Interior, and so forth. That is the language which is used. The appropriation was made for the purpose of paying the claims arising out of action taken on request or demand of certain departments. It has been held in construing that language that that means a personal demand or a personal request. This proposed legislation says that claims shall be allowed to those who suffered loss in response to personal, written, or published requests. They have broadened it, as you will see, to that class of claims where people volunteered because they saw a publication that the Government wanted certain stuff, who volunteered to go ahead and spend money on schemes that were not profitable, and never could have become profitable, and thereby they are importing into this a class of claims not embraced in the class which was provided for in the first appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman to claim that the present act goes beyond what the general act provided?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. For which an appropriation was made?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and that has been admitted by the gentleman from Arkansas. The proposed act goes to the point of allowing people who were not requested personally, who were not requested in writing, but who merely saw an advertisement and went ahead and acted on a public statement which they saw in the newspapers, to file claims, although it has been held in 600 claims that they could not come in under this act. It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that the matter has gone beyond the original scope of the appropriation, which was made for those people who had a claim under a request which had been held to be personal or a written request, I believe, of the department. It is the purpose now to extend it to all those volunteers who saw in the newspapers that the Government wanted certain things who went ahead and incurred expense. It will be seen, therefore, that the appropriation could not have been applied to them, and it had been held not to apply to them. They seek now to bring in 600 claims to which the appropriation did not apply and provide that they shall be paid out of that appropriation, which would not apply until this act supplies the force. They can not escape the fact that to that extent this is an appropriation of that money for a new claim.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to the provisions of this bill which enlarge the classes of claims which may be submitted to the commission, but I think the point of order is not well taken. The rule forbids committees of this House, except the Appropriations Committee, to report bills carrying appropriations of money. It does not forbid authorizations and it does not specifically forbid directions for payment out of existing appropriations. If this point of order be sustained, it must be based upon a liberal construction of the rule and not upon a strict construction. Under a strict construction of the rule the point of order would not lie. This rule is a restrictive rule, it is a rule which limits the jurisdiction of committees of this House, and I believe it is one of those rules which should be strictly construed. The test should be whether the bill increases the amount of money heretofore appropriated by the Congress for governmental purposes. If it does not increase such amount of money, then the point of order should be held not to lie. It is perfectly clear that it does not increase the amount of money heretofore appropriated.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUSTED. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Suppose that by the addition of or the making of these added claims available it would require more than the money already appropriated. Would not that be justification for a deficiency item in a deficiency appropriation bill; and if that should be the fact, would not this in reality be bringing on an appropriation?

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is assuming a state of facts which does not exist so far as the bill is concerned.

Mr. BEGG. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. HUSTED. Because this bill provides for payment out of an existing fund and does not contemplate the creation of an additional fund.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to cite to the Chair a precedent which bears directly on the point at issue. When the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] called up the bill seeking to extend prohibition to our island possessions, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] made the point of order that it would require the expenditure of the present appropriation for enforcing prohibition, and therefore it was seeking to divert a part of the money that was already appropriated for different purposes. And the Speaker upheld that point. Applying that to the present case, under the present law and under the present appropriation of $8,500,000, not a single dollar can be paid on these 610 claims which have been turned down, because they do not come within the provisions of the present law, and they do not come within the provision of the present appropriation.

But under the present bill that is before the committee, if it were passed, it would be possible to pay every single one of these 610 claimants that have been turned down out of the present appropriation, pro tanto, so far as it went. Therefore it is an identical case to that in which the point of order was sustained by the Speaker that was raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], because that was seeking to extend prohibition to the island possessions and seeking to use money that had been appropriated for enforcing prohibition only in the United States, and had not been appropriated for enforcing it in our island possessions; so the point of order should be sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The question is rather a close one, involving two very interesting points.

The point raised by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], that this committee would be permitted to authorize an appropriation, I think would not be contested. The question as to whether this is an authorization or not is a point in doubt, where it says that the Secretary of the Interior may award an additional amount, which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act. The Chair does not have any hesitancy in saying that an authorization does not necessarily require the word "authorize" to be used. Other language may be employed to mean the same thing, and the specific language would not change the ruling. Whether the Secretary of the Interior may award from the amounts or additional amounts carries an authorization or in addition an appropriation is a very close question. But assuming that it is merely an authorization, the language that follows it, namely, "which shall be paid from the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in said act," is very strong, and, in the mind of the Chair, equivalent to or tantamount to an appropriation. If it is an appropriation, as the Chair is inclined to think it is, we have a decision directly in point, delivered August 11, 1921, in which we find the following principle was asserted:

> Language reported in a bill from a committee not having jurisdiction to report appropriations, and which reappropriates, makes available, or diverts an appropriation or a portion of an appropriation already made for one purpose for or to another purpose is not in order.

There are other decisions along the same line.

The Chair admits it is a very close question whether other purposes than are found in the general act is clear, but the Chair is of the opinion that the language is broad enough to include other purposes, and for that reason he is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the chairman of the committee, unless the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] yields.

Mr. RHODES. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. I want to inquire, Mr. Chairman, as to the effect of the ruling just made. If I correctly understood the point of order, it goes to the authority of the committee to report this bill. Query: Is the Senate bill still before the committee, or does the decision which the Chair has just rendered render the entire report invalid, so that the bill goes off the calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the bill does not go off the calendar, because the point of order is directed only to the phraseology of the committee amendment.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, desiring to conform to the ruling of the Chair, to which we gracefully bow, I desire to reoffer the committee amendment with these words added at the end of line 11:

> When reappropriated for such purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. RHODES to the committee amendment: On page 3, line 12, after the word "act" insert: "when reappropriated for such purpose."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Was not the motion the entire amendment; and not only those words? The entire amendment reoffered, with certain words added?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the entire amendment was proposed to be amended.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then it should be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the second time, the Chair will regard it as properly reported.

There was no objection.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that it is now in order to discuss the committee amendment reoffered with the words added?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so, for five minutes.

Mr. RHODES. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that while to my mind this act only seeks to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to expend the money from the same appropriation heretofore authorized, yet I conceive the status of the pending bill to be this: That in the light of the ruling of the Chair, in order that this bill may go forward to final passage, we must conform to the ruling of the Chair in sustaining the point of order, which I have tried to do by offering the amendment at the end of line 11, which is as follows: "When reappropriated for such purpose."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. RHODES. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The Chair will observe, if the gentleman will permit me, that these words concede, following the ruling of the Chair, that there was an appropriation as the language stood.

These words, however, which are proposed to be added limit the preceding language, so that the authorization of payment is only permitted in case the money is reappropriated, so that, therefore, there can not be any appropriation if this language is added.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. How can an appropriation already made, which is available until expended, be reappropriated for this purpose?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The ruling of the Chair was that it was not for the same purpose. Therefore it has to be reappropriated to be applied to this particular purpose.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, responding to the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON], I regret very much to have to take this course, but if I understand the parliamentary situation, this is the only way that we can go forward and keep within the ruling of the Chair.

Now, under the provisions of this bill, in my judgment, if enacted into law with this amendment, we will still be able to accomplish the purpose that we set out to accomplish. Of course, to my mind it is as clear as the light of day that this legislation is necessary in order that the Secretary of the Interior might wind up the affairs of this commission. While it is hard for me to get away from that view of the matter, yet I insist that the House ought to pass the bill with my amendment in order to meet the situation just raised by the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. RHODES. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] yields for a question.

Mr. RHODES. I will be delighted if the gentleman will stop with one question.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman can stop his answers at any time he wants to. In view of the fact that the appropriation heretofore made is a continuing one, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] pointed out, there would probably not be any reappropriation, and the gentleman's language would not be very helpful to him. Would not the gentleman prefer, instead, to have these claims paid "from any appropriation hereafter made for that purpose"? It is immaterial to me.

Mr. RHODES. That would appear to me to accomplish the same purpose by taking another course.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri. I send it to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. WINGO. My amendment amends the pending amendment so as to read as follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO to the committee amendment: On page 3, line 10, after the word "shall," insert the words "be authorized to," so that the paragraph will read:
>
> "If in claims passed upon under said act awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or through miscalculation, the Secretary of the Interior may award proper amounts or additional amounts, which shall be authorized to be paid on the unexpended portion of the appropriation carried in this act."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. WINGO. I will ask the gentleman to make his point of order. Certainly the committee has not offered to authorize the appropriation. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not in the confidence of the gentleman from Arkansas, so that I only know what his amendment is by hearing it read. I understood it to be that the Secretary is authorized to pay from the unexpended appropriation. It is just a restatement of what the Chair has ruled out.

Mr. WINGO. I add it after the word "shall," so that it shall read, not the Secretary, but the "awards and amounts shall be authorized to be paid." In other words, I am making a clear-cut authorization. I do not think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri does what he thinks it does. You want to have a clear-cut authorization. That is what my amendment does. It says that "the awards or amounts shall be authorized to be paid."

Mr. BURTNESS. The amendment changes the language "shall be paid" to the language "which are authorized"?

Mr. WINGO. No. To the language "shall be authorized to be paid."

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. WINGO. I yield for that. I suggest to the gentleman to try to get unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, is there not pending a point of order?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] will not be so strict in the extension of time. I want five minutes.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Missouri by making it five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the committee has no authority to authorize payment out of a certain unexpended appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO to the committee amendment: Page 3, line 10, after the word "shall," insert "be authorized to."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, just one observation in reference to the point of order. My understanding is that under this language the payment would be authorized without any further action of Congress. Therefore the effect of that language is identical with that which the Chair has already ruled out of order. There is no question about it.

Mr. WINGO. I am willing to submit it to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. This is not an authorization of an appropriation, but an authorization of payment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES].

Mr. WINGO. Just when I get through I will yield the floor.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understood the Chair had ruled the gentleman's amendment out of order.

Mr. WINGO. I yielded only pending the decision on the point of order. I am opposed to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Arkansas has lost the floor, although if he desires to be recognized the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. WINGO. No; I am not quibbling about it at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to offer my amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I make the point of order that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] to close debate in 15 minutes is now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LAYTON. I offered an amendment to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the gentleman originally made his motion I made the point of order that a point of order was pending and that no such motion could be made at that time. Since that time the Chairman has recognized the gentleman from South Carolina to offer an amendment, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] can not be taken off his feet by a motion to close debate, because he has the right to the floor for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks technically the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to have my substitute reported.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, how is the committee to get recognition? The chairman of the committee was on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON offers as a substitute for the committee amendment offered by Mr. RHODES the following: Strike out the entire proviso and insert——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a substitute is not in order to a substitute.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wrote that when I thought it was all going out. I wish to amend by striking out all, beginning with the word "provided" in line 19, on page 2, and inserting what I have written.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON moves to amend by striking out, on page 2, line 19, all beginning with the word "provided" and ending with the word "act," on page 3, line 11, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That all claims mailed to the commission prior to 12 o'clock noon, June 2, 1919, shall be considered as if received by the commission prior to that date and hour and considered as other claims filed: Provided further, That if amended awards shall be made on account of miscalculations in the awards originally made, such new awards may be paid when the money is appropriated therefor."

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of order against that. It is offered as an amendment, but it shows that it is a substitute, because it strikes out all the text. The gentleman included the word "provided" to be stricken out, and so it is a substitute in fact. Therefore it is not in order, because the committee amendment is a substitute for the Senate bill. That was thrashed out and settled the other day, and the parliamentary clerk is very familiar with it.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was thrashed out and settled that it was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the further point of order that it is in effect an appropriation, because it seeks to provide for the payment of claims that are not now authorized by the present law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is not an amendment to the amendment which has been presented by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES]. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is pending. This amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has no relation whatever to it. If it is anything at all, this is a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. It is not an amendment to the amendment, but an entirely different matter that has no relation to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, and it is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that a substitute or an amendment is in order, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I make a point of order against the amendment offered, that it would make claims payable which are not now payable under the law and it is in effect an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if the proposal of the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is a substitute I desire to offer a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may offer his amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, gentlemen——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Do I understand the Chair to overrule my point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. Surely.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Chair holds that my amendment is in order either as a substitute or as an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Interior asked for two things, power to consider claims which were mailed before the time expired for filing them but which reached the commission after the time expired for filing them. That was the first thing he asked for. I think that is fair, and my substitute or amendment—whichever they propose to call it is in order—provides for that. That gives a square deal to all the people who tried honestly to conform to the law.

The second thing that the Secretary of the Interior asked was that we give him the right to make new awards which can be paid. My second paragraph provides for that, and provides that where they find mistakes have been made new awards shall be paid when appropriations are properly made to pay them. Those are two things that he asked for. My amendment provides for those two things, and does not provide for anything else.

The amendment of the committee provides for bringing in the claims of people who merely saw notices in the papers and went to work and spent money on what John J. Ingalls once called iridescent dreams, and who now want the Government to come up and pay for them. I submit that by that amendment I have offered it goes as far as the Secretary of the Interior asked for and no further, and it is all that we ought to do. [Applause.]

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the substitute. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement with all due regard to the very clear-cut statement made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, Mr. STEVENSON, of South Carolina. I want to say that I concede that the Secretary of the Interior has insisted on the two definite and certain provisions to which the gentleman referred. But the gentleman from South Carolina has not gone far enough. He did well, and I compliment him for having so clearly and correctly stated the facts as far as he went. The Secretary of the Interior not only wants these two things done but he wants more. If gentlemen will read his letter which is set forth in the report, they will see that the Secretary says that in his opinion he has power under the original act to enforce the law in such a way as to permit him to pass upon all these claims. The committee seeks to put into effect just what the Secretary wants. Now, I am not going to allow myself to get lost in the fog of this discussion. I think I know the purpose of this act, and if gentlemen will only read the report they will see that this bill does not undertake to bring in any new claims.

I want to answer the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Texas. How, in the name of common sense, could it make any difference whether the request was a written request, a personal request, or a newspaper publication? The terms are synonymous, connected by the conjunction "or." If the claim arises under the demand from either one of the five governmental agencies, how can it make any difference whether the request is in the form of a written publication or a newspaper publication or a personal request?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman states that the amendment covers the second proposition. It does not; it authorizes a correction where there is a mistake in figures, and nothing else.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman from California does not understand me or I do not understand him. I am warning the House against the adoption of the substitute to my amendment for the reason that if you adopt it you will defeat the very purpose of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The last portion of the Secretary's letter shows that he wants not only the Senate bill but something else besides, and one is where there is a mistake in the calculation.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate has expired on this amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understood that debate was limited to 20 minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. There has been five minutes' debate for the amendment and five against the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is an amendment in the third degree and is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is correct. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STEVENSON) there were 35 ayes and 57 noes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANDERSON to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 24, after the word "claims" at the end of the line, insert "or notice in writing thereof."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to permit consideration by the Secretary of the Interior of two claims which arose in connection with the stimulation for the production of manganese in Minnesota. I had this amendment submitted to the Secretary of the Interior last evening, and I have a notation on the amendment in his handwriting in which he says that he has no objection to its incorporation in the bill and it will involve only two claims, both of which relate to manganese.

As gentlemen will remember, at the beginning of the war manganese was a very important war material, but owing to lack of ships it was impossible to import the required amount of this material.

Mr. Franklin Merritt, who was president of both companies making these claims, was called to Washington by the Shipping Board and the War Industries Board for the purpose of consultation with respect to stimulating the production of manganese ore for war purposes. As a result of the conference the mines in Minnesota were opened. It was necessary that this should be done with the utmost speed. Machinery was installed with speedy production in view, without regard to expense. The machinery is now practically valueless for commercial operations under normal conditions.

Seven hundred thousand tons of ore were actually produced at great loss to the companies involved.

Losses were sustained by those two companies amounting in one case to $600,000 and in the other to $170,000, but on the basis of the allowances already made the total amount involved to the Treasury would be about $300,000. These companies are now in the hands of a receiver as a result of the losses which they sustained in these operations. This was a case in which the Government actually in writing and by verbal request demanded and insisted upon this stimulation of production upon which the money was expended by these companies as a result of the request. Unfortunately while notice was given in a letter to the Secretary of the Interior as to the existence of these two claims prior to the expiration of the time limit, the actual claim in the form required by the Secretary was not filed until after the time limit had expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Are those claims to which the gentleman alludes the claims included within those enumerated in the report or are they new claims?

Mr. ANDERSON. They are not claims which were filed in the sense in which the act uses that term, within the time limit, and consequently they are not included in the number the Secretary refers to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Does the gentleman know whether there are other claims of a similar character?

Mr. ANDERSON. So far as I know there are no other claims on which written notice was given that would come in under this amendment. The Secretary says there are no others that he knows of.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Had those claims, in proper form, been mailed prior to the expiration date?

Mr. ANDERSON. They had not.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. So that they would not be benefited by even the present law?

Mr. ANDERSON. They would not be benefited by the law unless the amendment that I have offered is adopted.

Mr. EVANS. In what form was this notice?

Mr. ANDERSON. In the form of a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, advising him of the operations that had proceeded at the request of the War Industries Board and the losses which were sustained as a result. It is possible that the Secretary will hold that this was a filing within the requirements of the law, but in order to obviate any question about it I have asked to have this amendment adopted. This does not settle the matter on the merits; the Secretary has to pass upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the committee and the time is exhausted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] for the same reason that I oppose the bill, because it broadens the scope of the original law and opens up another door to the public Treasury. These are not cases where these men were not afforded a forum. If they were, then I would view this bill in quite a different light. They did have a forum, they had a commission composed of an ex-Member of the House and an ex-Member of the Senate and a prominent employee in the Bureau of Mines. The claimants had a law for their relief, which Congress had enacted upon broad and liberal terms, and now, after having submitted their claims and having had them passed upon, they want another chance to be heard before a different Secretary of the Interior, and the committee here bring in the bill that authorizes a reopening of all of the matter and allows the claimants, whenever they can show that they have made these expenditures, either upon a personal, a written, or a published request or demand or appeal or solicitation or any conceivable sort of advertisement, to come in and have them again passed upon. About the same time that we passed this original law we passed the Dent Act, to authorize the settlement of war contracts which were not entered upon with the formality required by law.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I beg the gentleman to excuse me. I have only a short time remaining. The Secretary of War through his subordinates has adjudicated these claims. They amounted not only to millions of dollars but to billions, and of course all of these claimants whose claims have been rejected would like us to come in and liberalize the law and say to them, "Here is the Public Treasury, and we will be glad to give you another chance at it." I am opposed to any procedure of that kind. I ask gentlemen to listen to what the Federated American Engineering Societies say about this particular bill:

Should this legislation be enacted into law it will prove practically a mandate to allow all claims to be reopened. It has been estimated that in addition to the expenditure of the unexpended balance of four and a half million dollars out of the eight million dollars appropriated an additional appropriation will undoubtedly have to be made. The American Engineering Council has been committed to an economy program. It has not urged other very important legislation carrying other appropriations, because it has been felt that these things could wait until the Government finances were in better condition.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. My time is almost expired and I regret I can not yield. What I have just read is from a communication of the Federated American Engineering Societies, and, I submit, a very respectable authority concerning mines and minerals. If we adopt this bill it seems to me we will be enacting a law broad enough to cover every conceivable case. All that the claimant will have to do will be to show that he suffered a loss and then his claim will be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman fro: Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. ANDERSON) there were—ayes 42, noes 33.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 20, after the word "any," strike out "personal, written, or published," and strike out the commas after the word "request" and after the word "demand" and insert after the word "request" the word "or."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is debate exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is not germane, for the reason that the present existing law restricts the demand or request to personal ones. The gentleman's amendment seeks to throw it open so that any kind of a demand, regardless of whether it is personal or not, will throw the floodgates wide to a world of claims. I am willing to settle a just claim, but I am opposed to taking that restriction out of the law. It must be personal claims. The gentleman seeks to open it to any kind of a claim—personal, indirect, or anything.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The language would be just exactly as it is in the original act if my amendment were adopted. The original act is "request or demand." This amendment is an amendment to the original act, and I by my amendment am seeking to make it conform to the language of the original act, exactly. I expect to go further and move to strike out the words "solicitation or appeal," and I am offering these amendments seriatim, and I am now confining myself to the first one, which consists in striking out the words "personal, written, or published." By this amendment I am trying to make this act conform with the original act and to be no broader, and when the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] makes the point of order that I am broadening it I wish to say to him that I am restricting it by cutting out the words that make it broader, to wit, the words "personal, written, or published," which are in the original act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is absolutely correct. Even if the original act provided that these claims should be limited to those made upon personal request or demand, as the committee here is seeking to broaden it, it is within the power of the committee to limit it in any way it sees fit, provided it is within the purview of the provisions in the amendment under consideration. But the original act provides, as the gentleman from Illinois just stated, that it is not limited to claims based on personal request or demand. Even if it were, when amending the original act it is within the power of the committee to amend it within the limitations recognized by the rules.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman overlooks the fact that the House is now acting on the opinion of the Attorney General which the gentleman read. He rules that the word "demand" in existing law covered the word "personal." If you strike out the word "personal," it shows the intent of Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Attorney General said that the words "request" and "demand" were both synonymous with the word "ask."

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has not read it all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, the committee is seeking to broaden it so that they will consider claims not asked by these five instrumentalities, but any claim that might have been initiated on any newspaper report or publication not addressed to anyone in particular.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 20 and 21, strike out "solicitation or appeal"; in lines 20 and 21 on page 2 strike out the commas before and after the word "demand" in said line 20 and insert "or" between the words "request" and "demand" in said line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois) there were—ayes 39, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What became of the amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee at the end of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. It is still pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why do we not vote on it?

The CHAIRMAN. We will as soon as we get through with these other amendments.

The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois to the amendment offered by Mr. RHODES: Page 3, line 6, after the word "act," strike out "awards have been denied or made on rulings contrary to the provisions of this amendment, or" and insert a comma after the word "act" in line 6, page 3.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. May we have it read as it would correct that paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the paragraph as it would stand if amended.

The paragraph was accordingly read as it would read if amended.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. It is identical with one amendment that has been voted down. The gentleman from South Carolina tried to restrict——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is not in the same language.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RHODES] as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, is it in order now to move to strike out all after the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. Not until the vote is taken on the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 43.

Mr. STAFFORD. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. RHODES and Mr. BLACK to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 48.

So the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. CRAMTON. To make the motion that I made before.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, that is dilatory.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the Chair overlooks the fact that the House has voted on that. The House has already stricken out all after the enacting clause and inserted new language.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] moves to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to section 854 of the manual, which states that after the reading of the bill has been concluded a motion to strike out the enacting clause is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. When there is an amendment to a bill a motion to strike out the enacting clause is in order. The gentleman from Michigan offers a motion to strike out the enacting clause, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CRAMTON moves to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CRAMTON. A division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. A division has been called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 68.

So the motion of Mr. CRAMTON was rejected.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WALSH] having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 843) to amend section 5 of the act approved March 2, 1919, entitled "An act to provide relief in cases of contracts connected with the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes," had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri moves the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, on that vote I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 46.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, November 10, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:
